Fairyland and Return

By Jean Graham

A TRIP to Fairyland is not to be considered a luxury—it is an absolute necessity in these days of much distraction. "But, do you believe in fairies?" asks an incredulous person, who prides herself on being practical. Perhaps there are no fairies; but there is certainly a Fairyland, and it is the finest health resort in the world—or, should we say, out of the world?

There are tiresome and realistic citizens who think it is dangerous to tell the Small Persons fairy tales, and who would banish Cinderella and Snow White, to say nothing of the Prince and the Dwarfs, leaving nothing in the world but the cold realities of taxes and by-laws. In the novel "Hard Times," by Charles Dickens, there is that terrible person Thomas Gradgrind, who was provided "with a rule and a pair of scales and the multiplication table always in his pocket, sir, ready to weigh and measure any parcel of human nature and tell you exactly what it comes to." Thomas Gradgrind's policy crushed many a beautiful young fancy and withered many a bright aspiration, and Thomas was left, in a bleak old age, uncheered by anything more enlivening than facts and figures. So sad was the fate of the successful business man who refused to buy a ticket for Fairyland.

Who was your earliest friend in that magic country? Cinderella was my first love, and the fairy and the pumpkin were a delight for many a long year. Never does the early September afternoon come with the autumn sunlight on the pumpkin patch, but this Cinderella story comes back and there seems to be a small form darting about, to select the proper pumpkin to be transformed into a chariot fit for the fairy ball. What a dull world the young person of the future would have if these modern Gradgrinds had their way and sent Cinderella and all her sisters to the Never-Never Land! However, there is little danger of such an enforced exile—for have we not Sir James Barrie and Miss Maude Adams to bring back Cinderella and introduce Peter Pan to a weary world?

There are no playfellows more delightful than the immortal fairies who dance and sing and weave their spells through the enchanted hours of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." There they are, in a joyous band—Oberon, Titania, Puck, Peasblossom, Cobweb, Moth and Mustardseed—ready to amuse us with their frolics and soothe us with their music at our will. If you are tired of the noises of everyday, listen to Oberon when he sings:

"I know a bank whereon the wild thyme blows,
Where ox-lips and the nodding violet grows;
Quite over-canopied with lush woodbine,
With sweet musk roses and with eglantine."

The most gallant of them all is Puck or Robin Goodfellow, who gaily promises to "put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes," and who ejaculates "what fools these mortals be!" over easily duped humanity. Puck returns to us again and again, one of his Twentieth Century performances being in "Puck of Pook's Hill," where Mr. Kipling persuades him to tell brave tales of England in the making. But we hardly recognize Puck when he frowns at the word "fairy." Was not Shakespeare acting in supreme wisdom when he gave us for all time these sprites to chase dull care away and make us glad for the beauty of the earth?

Daintiest and fairest of all the great dramatist's ethereal creations is Ariel, who does the bidding of the master magician Prospero, and who is a comrade for Puck when he gaily replies: "I drink the air before me," in response to the final command ere he should attain his freedom. Even more exquisite than the fairy lyrics of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" are Ariel's songs. Such an outburst of summer gladness is hardly equalled to-day as the lines:

"Where the bee sucks, there suck I;
In the cowslip's bell I lie;
There I couch when owls do cry.
On the bat's back I do fly
After summer merrily . . ."

Are we not both happier and better for reading this dream drama of "The Tempest"—and is Prospero himself held in more vivid remembrance than his "tricky sprite"? The greatest name in English literature is associated with the Fairyland of forest and the charmed seas that beat upon Prospero's Island.

Then comes along a descendant of Thomas Gradgrind, who asks in all heaviness: "But these are serious and even dreadful days in which we are living. Isn't it a sinful waste of time to visit Fairyland and talk or write such nonsense about Ariel and Puck?" Go and quarrel with Shakespeare, my solemn friend, or with Milton, who wrote the great epic "Paradise Lost," yet who did not disdain to tell us of the fair Sabrina, "in twisted braids of lilies knitting the loose train of thy amber-dropping hair."

It is because these are perilous and fateful days that we need, more than ever before, the world of fancy, the surpassing solace of the imagination, that we may not be crushed beneath the burden of social and political

I played my lute to the world, but the world danced not and went on its way unheeding.
Only here and there I saw a solitary dancer, unnoticed of the rest, in an obscure corner.
And I grieved at the world, for I loved my music.
But when I looked again and discovered who they were that danced to my lute, forsooth I sorrowed no longer;
For they were the children of the new day.

There's a difference

NOTHING is more interesting in the development of the national situation in Canada to-day than her relation with the United States, and nothing under several aspects is more anomalous. Here are two peoples inhabiting the same continent under practically the same social and economic conditions, speaking the same language, and speaking it, alas, in much the same way, sharing doctrine in all that makes for good citizenship and freedom and happiness. On the surface we pay no great attention to each other. We mind our own business and go our own way, preserving the laws of good neighborhood and the profit of intimate trade. Labor ignores the boundary and flows naturally to where pockets are deepest. Capital crosses with equal ease, mainly from the South, arriving where opportunity is most inviting. We flock to each other's playgrounds, North and South, to escape the extremes of our respective climates. Our disputes, of late at all events, are insignificant. We present to the world really a remarkable example of how to live and let live, even among relatives. The great hope is that this state of things may continue indefinitely, each nation revolving about its own ideals and presenting agreeable and profitable differences in a world whose best flavor is individuality. The great anxiety, though we say little about it, is that this may not happen.

The Americans have never been a predatory people, and Canada does not lie awake o' nights anticipating mobilization in the lower States. Nor are they a people of deep-laid and subtle foreign policies, aiming a trade penetration at a political achievement. They have no desire to march on Ottawa, abolish the butler at Rideau Hall and deport the Duke of Devonshire as an undesirable alien.

It is fair to acknowledge that the Americanizing processes now going on in Canada are not marked by deliberate intention—propinquity accounts for them, the initiation of trade, simple human interest, explanations most natural and proper. If our populations and resources were fifty-fifty, we in Canada could accept the situation as perfectly normal, and view it with indifference. But they are not. The Americans have arrived at a hundred millions, we at eight. They were a nation with definite national consciousness and intentions for a hundred years before we began to think of being anything more than a colony, and we have been subject all that time to the polarity of their beliefs—not marked by a shyness in the expression—and of their neighborhood. We have had the opportunity of being particularly struck by their lack of desire for conquest and acquisition, and no doubt we have taken it, we could not very well help taking it, by a sort of automatic inoculation, and it is an influence much to be counted with.

THE odd thing is that in the face of so much that is sympathetic, and so much that is admirable in American institutions, the general feeling in Canada at present can by no means be described as pro-American. Parliament is no doubt careful in utterance, and very rightly. Official words have a sting which is apt to remain, and the debates at Ottawa happily afford little evidence of the tone of irritated criticism which is so characteristic of Canadian comment upon the people and policies of the United States elsewhere.

Individual relations are of the pleasantest, individual appreciations of the highest, yet in the mass our opinion of our neighbors appears to be most tolerantly summed up in a shrug. In the first years of the war this feeling was naturally much exacerbated. The spectacle of profits rolling in, while no troops rolled out, was too much for our patience and often for our sense of justice and good taste. That was applicable enough, but the prevailing under-current of antagonism to the American people existed long before 1914, and has survived 1920. It suddenly jumped to the eye in the failure to carry Reciprocity as an election issue, and it can be detected, without any great exertion, in the popular comments on the accepted theory that the Americans, as a nation, declare and maintain that they "won the war."

This Canadian attitude, though it rests no doubt upon some experience, is a little humiliating, when considered from the outside, for two reasons. The first, and nearest, is that it appears to be unreciprocated. Insofar as American opinion of Canada and the Canadians can be ascertained it is one of generous appreciation. Nobody over there crabbed our motives when we went into the war, or stinted admiration of our manner of doing it—at all events so that it was recognizable—so that you would notice it, as they say. Nor have they held back on the practical side, as the long list of Canadians holding positions of commercial and professional distinction in American cities testify. No doubt there is something in this complacency, since there is no doubt that in international disputes they have usually got the best of the bargain, from the days when we lost the State of Maine to those of the Alaska Boundary award, occasions which suggest the old proverb, "If you want a thing well done, do it yourself."

But you cannot do some things yourself, unless you have the men and the ships behind you, and our indignation with the performance of the urbane but not particularly business-like British noblemen who have hitherto had so large a part in the attempt to maintain Canadian rights may perhaps be tempered by the reflection that on Great Britain, after all, lay the onus of upholding them. We are gradually righting that matter. However, the fact that our big neighbor has usually got the better of us in international business no doubt explains a considerable amount of American good nature and of Canadian irritation.

The second reason why one is inclined to deprecate the perpetual pin-pricks and sneering references of our newspapers at American expense is the comparison it evokes with the British method. No one who has lived in England during the last quarter of a century could fail to be struck by the constant good feeling, correctness, dignity and tact of the British press in dealing with American action as touching British interests, even during the first trying years of the war. I can think of one only of the great dailies—the hot-headed "Morning Post" with its notorious invitation to "come in on one side or the other"—that sinned in this regard against international propriety and the greater interests of the Anglo-Saxon race as compared with those of any of the Anglo-Saxon nations. It is the lesson of the larger tradition and the restraint that accompanies it. We have not shown it in Canada, and our antipathy, insofar as it is advertised, makes us look petty and a little ridiculous.

ONE would think that insofar as popular sentiment can be a guide, Canada's trend is definitely not toward the bosom of Uncle Sam. Rather, it would appear, that we are profiting by our neighbor's social, political and economic experience, to order our own house differently, and, in spite of the economy of co-operative house-keeping, to order it independently. Politically we are exceedingly disposed to work out our own salvation. For a hundred years and more Canada's chief interests were politics and religion, a circumstance that must exert a compelling influence upon character. Our independence is so pronounced as to be almost exaggerated. And yet it is quite obvious that the country is soaking up American impressions from Halifax to Vancouver. It is most noticeable, as it is most natural, in social habits, in business methods, in economic ideals. We share the physical conditions of life and we have drawn our population from much the same sources and classes. In fighting nature and establishing civilization we have come through much the same experiences. It would be strange if our material satisfactions greatly differed, or if the lead in suggesting and supplying them was not taken by our highly capitalized and extremely energetic neighbor.

But these things are of the surface; there are considerations more subtle than an electric washing machine or a Ford car. Canada is inundated by American current literature. The American point of view in domestic matters is forever before us. It is usually very sane, it appeals to us. Often it edifies, always it entertains us. And so long as it is confined to qualifications for success in business, or efficiency in municipal administration, or scientific elimination of waste, we can profit with an easy mind. Unfortunately there is another aspect—that of Canadian and American relations to the world outside this continent. Canada is part and partner in an Imperial System of which the United States disapproves, less by observation than by inherited bias. The great majority of Americans have learned no British Imperial policy since 1776. Their dislike of it then made them a separate people, and in the lack of deeper-rooted national tradition, they have nourished this one out of all proportion.

Their attitude toward England's modern administration of India, of Egypt, notoriously of Ireland, is of criticism, distrust and hostility. That would not matter to us if they kept their views to themselves. It would not matter very much if their opinions reached us in the character of opinions. But they do not. They reach us every day in our own papers in the form of intelligence, supplied by the American correspondents in London and elsewhere of the Associated Press of America; and the bias of them is plain, not in the expression of opinion, but in the presentation of news, a much more insidious and efficient form of propaganda. In writing their cablegrams, these American correspondents have no thought of undermining Canadian sentiment toward Great Britain. They are catering to their own countrymen through their own journals and they give their news the dressing which will make it most palatable.

MOREOVER they hand on their own point of view. Read American Associated Press messages dealing with Great Britain's troubles in her incalculably onerous task of administering the great trusts that are hers in the world, and you will seldom fail to find a line or two suggesting that her difficulties are of her own making. This has been going on here for a long time and the result is that Canadian opinion upon these aspects of Imperial policy is often as half-informed, as prejudiced and almost as violent as American. Not only in political affairs but in all matters—of trade, of economics, of social progress and policy—in which the views and the interests of the British Empire and the United States of America may not be identical are we daily offered the presentation of the case from the American side—the presentation primarily made for the people of the United States.

The Associated Press of America, whose messages form so large a part of our daily fare, has a well deserved reputation for fairness in dealing with the domestic concerns of the United States. Neither the Democratic nor the Republican machine has ever been able to capture its activities, and its integrity is a point of national pride. But human nature is but human nature and the American variety of it abroad is everywhere the ambassador of American ideals, and the servant of American interests. Consciously or unconsciously every American is the apostle of his national creed.

Granted the American temperament, it could not be otherwise. I repeat that the foreign news gatherer for the United States is not a deliberate propagandist for Canada. It is nothing to him that his messages are sold to Canadian newspapers as well as to American ones. The circumstance does not come into his calculations. It bulks with some importance, however, in the accounts of the Associated Press, to whom the Canadian market is increasingly valuable. Once the cable charges to New York are paid, the cost of telegraphing European news over to Canada is comparatively small. The service represents so much extra profit, and is supplied with tempting cheapness to the Canadian press proprietor.

Consequently we have the curious spectacle of Canadian newspapers expressing editorially a constant irritation with American action, and presenting in their news columns the American view with every advantage. Not only is this the case through the agency of the Associated Press of America, but the special correspondence of the great journals of New York and Chicago is shared by our Toronto newspapers and elsewhere. One blushes to read in Canadian newspapers of unimpeached Imperialism, ex parte accounts of such activities as Sinn Fein, drawn from American sources; and the fact that the organization is denounced in the next column by no means neutralizes the damage—only makes the position fatuous as well as dangerous.

It is a difficult situation to tackle. An attempt has been made. Canada makes a small appropriation which is spent on sustaining a correspondent in London, who is supposed to wire news of

Under Searching Eyes—

Do you ever wince inwardly?

AN unexpected meeting—a battery of eyes focused upon your face—Can you meet it with composure? Is your skin flawless? Clear, lovely in coloring?

Or is there some blemish that stands out mercilessly in your own consciousness? Some fault in your complexion that you know observant eyes must take notice of?

There is nothing that so destroys a man's or woman's poise and self-confidence as the consciousness of a complexion at fault. Even a little blemish in some conspicuous place makes you miserably embarrassed. You want to shrink into the back-ground. You lose your confidence, your gaiety. Your very personality is dimmed just when you are most anxious to appear at your best.

Yet this suffering is entirely needless. You need never be miserable and tongue-tied from such self-consciousness. Almost anyone, by simple, regular hygienic care of the skin, can free her complexion of the defects that so commonly mar an otherwise lovely face.

Blackheads are such a disfigurement. Enlarged nose pores, a skin that will get shiny—These things can be corrected.

Take care of the new skin that is forming every day as old skin dies. Give it every night the right treatment for your particular trouble, and within a week or ten days you will notice a marked improvement.

Take one of the most common skin troubles. Perhaps your skin is constantly being marred by unsightly little blemishes. No doubt you attribute them to something wrong in your blood—but authorities on the skin now agree that in the great majority of cases, these blemishes are caused by bacteria and parasites that are carried into the pores from outside, through dust and fine particles in the air.

How to remove skin blemishes

By using the Woodbury method of cleansing your skin, you can free it from such blemishes.

Just before retiring, wash in your usual way with warm water and Woodbury's Facial Soap, finishing with a dash of cold water. Then dip the tips of your fingers in warm water and rub them on the cake of Woodbury's until they are covered with a heavy, cream-like lather. Cover each blemish with a thick coat of this and leave it on for ten minutes. Then rinse your face very carefully, first with clear hot water, then with cold.

Use this treatment regularly and the blemishes will gradually disappear.

The famous treatment for conspicuous nose pores

Do you know what it is that causes conspicuous nose pores?

The pores of the face are not as fine as on other parts of the body. On the nose, especially, there are more fat glands than elsewhere, and there is more activity of the pores.

These pores, if not properly stimulated and kept free from dirt, lose their power to contract properly; they clog up and become enlarged.

Try using this special treatment for conspicuous nose pores, and supplement it with the steady, general use of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Wring a soft cloth from very hot water, lather it with Woodbury's Facial Soap, then hold it to your face. When the heat has expanded the pores, rub in very gently a fresh lather of Woodbury's. Repeat this hot water and lather application several times, stopping at once if your nose feels sensitive. Then finish by rubbing the nose with a piece of ice. Always dry your skin carefully.

Use this treatment every night before retiring, and before long you will notice how this gradually reduces the enlarged pores until they become inconspicuous. But do not expect to change completely in a week a condition resulting from long continued exposure and neglect.

Special treatments for all the commoner skin troubles are given in the booklet that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Get a cake today—begin tonight, the treatment your skin needs.

You will find Woodbury's Facial Soap on sale at any drug store or toilet goods counter in the United States or Canada. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, or for general cleansing use.

Would you like to have a trial size cake?

For 6 cents we will send you a trial size cake (enough for a week of any Woodbury facial treatment) together with the booklet of treatments, "A Skin You Love to Touch." Or for 15 cents we will send you the treatment booklet and samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited 5205 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

Her <sup>$2.00</sup> Official Self

By Marshall Saunders

Author of "Beautiful Joe"

ILLUSTRATED BY E. J. DINSMORE

WYNNE DRYFIELD wrinkled his brow over his note-book. His bright young assistant editor, Henry Maybury, had just been snatched away in the bloom of youth and the pride of life, by the unsparing, raging "flu."

"Horrible! horrible!" he muttered. "I got him fresh from college, and he was a marvel of a boy to mould. Where shall I get another like him? I'm like the man who couldn't get married, because all the women he wanted wouldn't have him, and all those who wanted him, he wouldn't have."

He raised his eyes from his desk. First, he faced the light from a big plate glass window fronting a busy street, then his glance drifted aimlessly to a corner.

Such a bright pair of eyes peered at him from the nook where his stenographer, Elizabeth Sterling, chose to ensconce herself.

"Mr. Dryfield," she said quietly, "I know what you're thinking of. I can help you."

THE phlegmatic man actually started. He had never heard her make an original remark before, in the twelve months that she had been with him. To tell the truth, he really did not know what she looked like. She had no more individuality to him, than his desk or his office chair.

Then he stared at her over his reading glasses. She was a slight, quiet, dark thing with heavy wavy, black hair, and such a firm, little mouth—"such a firm little mouth," he reflected.

"If you know the subject of my thoughts," he said, "mention it."

"You wish someone to write editorials, leaders especially," said the girl primly, "while you attend to the management of the paper."

Dryfield, still amazed, nodded his head, and contented himself with a doubtful, "Well!"

"May I show you these?" asked Elizabeth briskly, and getting up, she untied a thick, flat bundle of paper.

"I don't understand," he said. "What is this typewritten stuff?"

"If you look at the headings, sir, you will see that they are newspaper articles. I have been writing them for months. When you suggested a subject to Mr. Maybury to write on, I did likewise. He treated his matter in one way, I in another."

"Oh! I see," exclaimed Dryfield, "but his articles were published and yours were not. Have they ever seen the light in any other way?"

"Only the light of my own family," she said.

"He never knew?"

"He never knew," she repeated, "and you would never have known, if he had not died."

"And you are applying for the post of assistant editor?" asked Dryfield.

"Yes, sir," she observed calmly.

"Well, well, women are in everything now. I am a bit conservative in my views."

"Yes, I know," she said quietly.

"Of course, I can't give you an answer offhand," he said, gathering up the sheets. "You will let me look them over?"

"Certainly," she said, and like a little, gray mouse, she crept back to her corner.

IN a few minutes, she took up her pencils and note-books, and withdrew to her own particular sanctum, where he soon heard her tapping her typewriter keys.

Putting down a rival daily that he was looking over, he drew some of her pages toward him.

He read on and on, for an hour. "Well—I am astounded," he muttered, then he put his hand under the table and touched his bell.

"Miss Sterling," he said, as the girl entered the room, "did I understand you to say that you composed all these articles?"

"No, sir, I should have explained that the first ones were written by my father."

Dryfield searched the depths of his memory. "Haven't I heard that he was a retired clergyman?"

"Yes sir, he died two months ago."

"I thought there was a slight break in the style, but not much. Do you mean to tell me, that you, unassisted, wrote these late things on 'After-Effects of The War?'"

"Yes, sir," she said, blushing slightly.

"They're heavy, ponderous—not a girl's style."

"I am twenty-five years old sir," she said quietly.

The man started slightly. "I beg your pardon, but you amaze me. Why—" and he looked at her appraisingly, for the first time since she had been in his employ, "I should say you were about eighteen."

"I've had a great deal of trouble," she said slowly. "My mother was killed in a street car accident, then my father lost his health, and I had to help educate my young sister and brother. I've had no time for pursuits that make one frivolous, and I've had much time to reflect."

DRYFIELD again wrinkled his eyebrows, and gave a peculiar twist to his rather thin-lipped mouth. "I've looked over some of these," he said guardedly, "suppose you try helping me keep up the editorial page, until I can get a man, but, by the way, who will take your place with my correspondence?" he added, in a rather selfish alarm of a man who has had a quiet, steady, little machine at his elbow for months and surveys with dismay the prospect of its being snatched away from him.

"My young sister," she said calmly. "She's twenty now, and I've trained her to replace me."

Dryfield now did break into a laugh. "Upon my word, Miss Sterling," he said, "you're a master piece. I congratulate you on having astonished a man who thought he could no longer be astonished, even though the skies should fall."

She smiled faintly, and glancing at the big office clock, said, "May I go now sir? It's an hour after my time, and I have the dinner to get."

"Go, by all means—I apologize. Shall I see you at the usual time in the morning?"

"Yes, indeed," she replied, "and may I bring my sister with me? I'll have to induct her."

"Yes, yes," he said hastily. "It sounds like a

She smiled at them, pale, angry, but quite unshaken in her splendid faith. "You are quite wrong. I will prove to you that you are wrong!"

A Story of "Answering House": by Marjorie L. C. Pickthall

It was evening when he entered the town by the road from Amiens. He carried a bundle done up in a yellow handkerchief under one arm. His hands were thrust into the pockets of his dusty velveteen trousers, and he walked, as he had walked for hours and days, at one unvarying stride; head bent, eyes raised and fixed on some invisible point in the horizon which he never neared yet never lost. It was twilight when he crossed the little Place, yet two old women coming from the church saw that fixed look, that indomitable stride, and shrugged their shoulders, saying softly, "He has suffered, that one." They were very familiar with the signs of suffering.

It was an evening after rain, and the town was gleaming wet under a cold sky where masses of flying steam-like cloud changed from gray to gold, and then to gray again. The streets and house-fronts changed with the sky,—slate, burning amber, black. Every one of those houses was disfigured in some way, covered with boards or tin, patched with raw plaster. Many were beyond healing and stared with vacant window sockets in gaping walls. And all among them and around them, even in them, were crowds of little wooden shanties where lived and traded, laughed and worked, one of the immortal nations of the world.

This man had not seen the town for five years. He was uncertain of his direction. He drifted to the market, which had been cleared. A few women lingered, gathering their wares into baskets and cloths. Striding slowly, the man Carobert went to one of them and spoke.

"MADAME, is there a house in this town called Answering House,—La Maison Qui Répond?"

Madame looked him over leisurely, saying,

"There's no shelter to be had at Answering House, Monsieur."

"Madame, I am not looking for lodging. I am provided."

"What then?"

"It is that I met a man on the way here who spoke of the house to me. He said he had seen it before the war. He said that it was full of echoes,—very strange."

Madame looked at the velveteen trousers. "Monsieur is an artist?"

"No, Madame."

"Well . . . it is you that are the original, my friend, to arrive in a town at this hour and to look for echoes. There is one here who can tell you about your echoes. . . . Emilie! Emilie Haye!"

At the word, Carobert stepped back and flung up his hands as if to shield himself from an explosion. Madame did not see. She called again across the shadowy market place, and an old voice answered, clear as a bell, "I am here, my good Ursule."

"She was always a little proud, that one," said the market woman, confidentially, "a little above us others. . . . well, go to her," and she took Carobert gently by the elbow and pushed him towards the voice. He seemed to shrink from her hand, to hang back. "Ho, ho!" laughed the big woman, "one would think you owed her money! Never fear if you do, mon vieux. She will not recognize you. She is blind."

Very slowly, at his staring stride, the refugee went to Emilie.

"ONE has told me, Madame, that you know something of a house, a very strange house, not far from here."

"Answering House?"

"The same, Madame."

The tall old woman sitting, wrapped in a black shawl, on the top of a big basket, raised her face slowly to her questioner. Again he backed and flung out his hands; across her face, under her cap, ran a broad, black band; it gave her, in the twilight, a ghastly effect as though she ended at the mouth. She heard his movement and said patiently, "I was blinded by a fragment of a shell, Monsieur. I am waiting for a young girl who comes to take me home."

"It is war, Madame."

"Yes, it is war. . . . And you want to hear of Answering House?"

"If you can tell me, Madame."

"I can tell you. I lived there for forty years. . . until a little while ago."

"Can you tell me about the echoes, Madame?"

"Yes. . . . When I first went there, they frightened me. It was something in the shape of the house, you understand. If you stood between the bay-trees in green tubs, just where the path divided into two to go around the flower-bed, and shouted, the house would shout back at you. Words? Yes, but not all one said. Just a syllable here and there. But that was all the more strange, for sometimes these broken echoes made sense, and then it was as if the house answered independently of what had been said to it."

"Besides the echoes, and the bay-trees, and the flowers, there were doves in a cote, and old carvings on the wall. It stood high, the house. It was very pleasant in summer. But that was before the days of Ehrens."

SHE gave the name its French value. Again Carobert ducked. She heard him.

"Monsieur stands unsteadily."

"It is my foot, I hurt it on the road."

"Yet you stand to listen to the story of a house?"

"It takes the mind off, Madame. . . if you will be so good. And this Ehrens? I have heard of him."

"You would hear more of him in hell," said the neat old lady, simply. "He was the best spy the Boche had hereabouts. Old? No, nor, yet young, but the young loved him. A slender man, quiet, with a ready smile. . . . He was left-handed owing to some injury to his right, which was almost helpless."

Carobert drew his right hand slowly from his pocket, looked at it as if he'd never seen it before, and thrust it back again.

The old woman was silent. Then she said briefly "Laure was very young."

"Laure," repeated the man vaguely, "Laure . . ."

The blinded face with the black band across it turned to him patiently. "I speak of her as if she were my own child. . . . my Laure. I was only the servant, Monsieur, and then the house-keeper when Madame died. She died when Laure was very little. They were of very good family; they had lived in that house for generations. There was a fig-tree against the south side of the house which was a hundred years old. The top of the house was older than the lower storeys, which had been altered. It was a roof of golden tiles and green mosses; it went together in the middle—so—and in the fold of the tiles, if you follow me, behind the chimneys, were two little old windows in the roof; one looked north; one looked south, and the fig-tree reached up every year and blinded it.

"THERE were a lot of old things in the house, but the echoes must have been the oldest of all, and were the most strange. It was as if the house had a voice. Standing between the bay trees and calling to it, the house would answer. . . . just a word or two. It was the custom to consult the house when anything arose that was hard to decide. I have seen Monsieur, my Laure's father, stand in the garden and cry, 'Shall we have buttered cakes or plain cakes?' If the house called back a ghost of a word that sounded like butter, we had our cakes with butter. The house was like many old things, it talked best in the evening. I don't know why. No one knows why.

"When Laure was a little child she played with the house as other children play with dolls and kittens. She would hide behind the bay trees, staring at the house through the leaves, and crying all sorts of things. If she could get the house to say 'Laure, Laure!' she was very happy. Sometimes she would run to me and catch my hand and say in her baby talk, 'It's coming out, Emilie, it's coming out!' But the echo never came out. It was just a voice that lived in the house.

"My Laure grew tall; she was fair, very soft, very innocent. Even when she was seventeen, she was a child, and would hide behind the bays and ask the house what dress she should wear when she went to call for Monsieur, at his office. He still went to his office; but the young men did the work. We were very happy, though two of us were growing old. Only the house, Answering House, did not change at all. The voices did not grow old.

"I T was Monsieur who brought Ehrens to the house. He met the man—I forget where, it doesn't matter—and was interested in him. Ehrens had travelled, could talk. . . . The question was, should he be asked for music in the evening, or for the English five o'clock that Laure had commenced in imitation of the fashionables? They asked the house, and the echo said 'Music, music,' or they thought it did. With laughter, he was asked for the evening. He came, and saw Laure, and heard the music. . . .

"What music was then rolling in the distance, if they had had ears for it! That was music which Ehrens only heard.

"After that, he came and went. . . . went and came. We liked him. I liked him. It was evident soon enough what he felt for Laure. He was like a lad in her presence,—shy, eager, sensitive; he grew young for her. I thought well of it. She was so tender, so simple, it seemed she would be happier with the protection of an older man; and after all, he was but in his prime.

"I saw them. . . . I heard them. If the house gave back any answer to them in those days, it must have said 'Love' and again 'Love.'

"Then Ehrens asked Monsieur for the hand of Laure. And it was refused him.

"What subtle distrust, what instinct, what feeling of the very flesh worked in that old man, who can say? He was not to be moved. The end was that Ehrens was forbidden to come to the house or Laure to see him.

"She came to me, very white, but with a shining face. 'Papa is so old,' she said gently, 'he has forgotten. . . . As if it would make any difference. There are so many ways in which heart can talk to heart!' Then she laughed a little, and blushed a little, and cried a little, and I petted her, the pretty dear. . . .

"Ehrens came once more to the house. He came in the evening—running. It was the end of July, and there had been rumors, and grim faces of old men who remembered, and a weight in the air. . . . I saw him running up the path towards the bay trees. She too had seen. She flashed to meet him like a dove, holding her hands to him. I heard her quick voice,—'What hast thou?' And he dropped at her feet, on his knees; he held up his clumsy right hand; with his left he caught her dress and crushed it to his face. She was frightened, she trembled; she had never seen him so. . . . At last he cried out in a strange voice, 'Laure, Laure, it is War.'

"She repeated faintly, 'War?' And Answering House caught his voice and flung the word back in a flurry of echoes.

"He bent his head. After a little he said, 'Forgive me. Oh my child, forgive me!'

"SHE thought she knew what he meant, the little one! Gentle as a saint she lifted that queer right hand of his and kissed it. 'If you cannot fight for France with your right hand you can fight with your heart,' she said.

"Soon he went away. I never saw him again. I think he wept.

"Then came the war. . . . It went very ill for us in this town. All that we said, all that we did, seemed to be known. The Boche was near. Sometimes he dropped bombs on us. It was said that we would soon be within range of his big guns. We waited. Laure worked at the hospital, she went nowhere else, she had no letters; but I knew that somehow she was in touch with Ehrens by the light in her face.

"And then. . . .

"Yes, I will tell you, that there may be one more soul in the world to curse Ehrens.

"One evening, there came to me a message from my master that I should go to them in the

"My master said, 'Continue, Xavier,' to the Mayor.

"The Mayor got up and came to Laure. His eyes were dim. He took her hands. He said very softly, 'Little one, do you love France?'

"She looked at him. . . . He went on, 'Then will you suffer our questions for the sake of France: . . . And you, Henri, will you be silent, whatever you hear?—in the same cause?'

"My master said once more, in a low voice, 'Continue, Xavier.'

"LAURE," said the good Mayor, 'will you then tell me if it is true that in the little window at the top of the house you have a lamp, and that you—move it about at night?'

"She was pink all over, but there was mischief in her bright eyes. She said, 'Yes, it's true. I make signals with it!'

"The room was very still. At last the Colonel asked softly, 'To whom do you signal, Ma'mselle Laure?'

"She said proudly, 'To Monsieur Ehrens. But there is no harm in it. We only signal poetry!' Then her courage broke, she hid her face and ran to her father, crouching beside him. She said 'Papa, papa, I am glad you know. I have wanted to tell you! But it is only poetry. I will show it all to you. I am sorry I have been so naughty. When a thing amuses me, I do not think. . . . He laid his hand on her head, but he did not move. No one spoke. At last the Colonel motioned to my master, who said, 'You must show me the poetry, Laure.' She got up at once and went for it, saying as she left the room, 'You will think me very silly as well as disobedient. But I was very lonely, and—I love him.' The last words were a divine breath. My master groaned. The Mayor laid his hand on his shoulder. The Colonel fussed about the room till she came back.

"She handed the paper to her father, very red, then she came and hid her face on my shoulder. . . . After a time my master said in a strange voice, 'Is this all?' She nodded without lifting her head. Silently, he handed the paper to the Mayor, and he to the Colonel, who kept it.

"I have seen it, too. It was a little piece with couplets on it—silly little verses. One line as it were, answered the first. . . .

"Such stuff! The first line was, 'The rose is shut. Goodnight, goodnight!' and the second was

'I'll think of you by candlelight,' and so on. After each line were a few little dots and scratches, at which the Colonel looked very closely. He said, 'Tell me about this, my dear, little Ma'mselle.'

"A very small, shamed voice replied, 'Monsieur Ehrens lives down near the river, in an old house that stands north of this one. He is working very hard, organizing charitable relief.'

"The Mayor glanced at the Colonel, who nodded. 'That much we know.'

"What I saw when I opened the door I see now, though I am blind. My master was sitting at his table, his hand over his eyes. I saw that hand tremble. Beside him sat the Mayor and our Colonel Fauquier. . . . In front of them stood Laure; she was surprised, but not at all frightened; even a little amused. Why then should I have been frightened? The Mayor was Laure's godfather; the Colonel had known us—had known her—all her life. They looked at her very gently. But I was frightened, and I went and stood beside her.

"The secret of a woman's social success is adaptability," said the instructress. "Men like to ride their own particular hobbies, so let them."

Perhaps they do. But read the story of the jolly time of one girl who mixed the hobbies.

MRS. CLARENDON was pouring her perfect tea from her perfect service with perfect grace. Correctness radiated from her, from each crisp wave in her netted coiffure to the discreet polish on her well-shaped nails and the still more discreet smile on her pink lips. Like a Pythoness, she sat in her shaded drawing room, with the season's debutantes grouped about her like devotees at a shrine, dispensing words of wisdom with her orange pekoe. However, there was nothing veiled or insinuating in Mrs. Clarendon's oracular utterances—clear and unmistakable they sank into the minds of her wide-eyed young listeners.

There was a startling similarity in the appearance of the "buds." There were, of course, the accidents of coloring and features, but their expression, and even their clothes, seemed designed to destroy any personal individuality each one might possess. Dark haired girls and blonde ones, with eyes of varying blues or browns under their hair line brows, all wore the look of well-bred complacency, and let fall the same stereotyped phrases sufficiently to make them almost indistinguishable.

The exception as usual proved the rule. On the edge of the group, bestowing indifferent attention to the conversation, but healthy interest in her tea and scones, sat Althea Sherwood, as unlike the rest of the party as it was possible for anyone to be. The tea had very evidently been an incident to her, not the business of her afternoon, most of which had been spent in a swift walk that had brought the rich color into her cheeks and an added rush of vitality to her vivid eyes. Her deep brown hair was drawn back almost severely, giving the somewhat unusual sight of a pair of well-shaped ears, which, however, caught but little of what was being said, so occupied was she in realizing how far from Hilton she had drifted in the long years away at school and abroad.

"ADAPTABILITY, that is the secret of a woman's social success," their hostess was saying cannily. "Men like to ride their own particular hobbies—they are rigid creatures, you see—so let them. I say, if it makes us all happier, and I think you'll all agree with me it does, after to-night—that is, after you meet Hilton's three czars."

She looked around the little circle with an appraising eye.

"There's nothing I enjoy as much as the Country Club's Fancy Dress, the first big ball where the debutantes meet to test their merits. Before I went to Europe, I never missed it. It was like a game, watching this girl come into her own or not as the case might be, and since the three men I spoke of have come to town it's been too interesting for words." She laughed softly. "You children away at school haven't realized what autocrats have risen to power in your absence, but let me warn you, any one of them can just about make a girl popular or the opposite, by being nice to her or indifferent, as the case may be."

She leaned forward confidentially.

"And the secret? Just what I've been saying—adaptability to type. Let Jerry Paxton talk horses and you're made. He's won more polo matches than you could count, and has spent a good sized fortune on horses. Jack Cumpson is an entirely different type. He is the most marvelous dancer in Hilton, and, moreover, knows the history of aesthetics from A to Z. Then there's dear Peter Forman, who is intellectual to the last degree, and only needs a willing listener to charm him into volubility."

She spread out her soft palms with an expressive gesture.

"Could anything be simpler? Win these three popular men to-night, and your path will be easy. Just remember—Jerry, horses; Jack, dancing; and Peter, books. And now goodbye, good luck."

AS Althea Sherwood entered the Country Club's huge ballroom that night, she realized, with a sudden feeling of panic, that there was not one man there on whom she could depend to be attentive to her. Worse still, she knew that in her haphazard listening to Mrs. Clarendon's advice, she had thrown away her only chance. Three men in the room were men of one idea. There was a Paxton, a Forman, a Cumpson, who were bored unless talking books, horses, and dancing, but which was which?

It is all very well in your sanctum sanctorum to scorn society and all its foibles. It is another thing to be a slim, pulsing girl in the gold tulle of an autumn sprite, standing at the door of a blazing, crowded ballroom, and knowing that perhaps in all that heart of gayety there may be no place for you. Being within the inner circle you may criticize, but when without, you long to pass within its charmed precincts.

All this whirled dizzily through Althea's head as she saw Mrs. Clarendon crossing the room toward her, a tall, young man in tow. No time to ask frantically of anyone the why's and wherefore's of this advancing youth—they were upon her; Mrs. Clarendon was murmuring his name; they were on the floor. Despair seized upon her. Who was he? Was he the lover of horses, the student, the aesthete? She stole a look at him. He was slim and brown, with hair bleached as by the sun. Was he the sportsman? She drew in a little breath, and groped for some suitable opening, when quite suddenly the whole thing went from her mind.

ACROSS the room, talking earnestly to a tall, young man, was one of the prettiest of the debutantes, dressed as a rustic beauty. Her lovely hair clustered in thick ringlets around her neck. On her arm hung a huge hat, but it was her face, as she looked tenderly at the man, that drew one. In it was all the awakening, all the adoration of first love.

"Lucy," murmured Althea, delightedly. "Isn't that a perfect picture?"

"Yes," her partner laughed back, "but don't forget the dewberries, and don't, please, spoil my illusions by making yon stripling Richard Feverel."

There was no lack of spontaneity in Althea's answering mirth. The relief was so sudden, so unexpected, that it bubbled to her lips, and echoed in a long, charming laugh. It was the book man, of course. Who else would have recognized her somewhat far fetched allusion to Meredith? She was saved, at least temporarily, and happily she plunged into talk of books she had read and re-read, finding so much in common with him, that the dance over, they wandered out into the Lounge, where they chatted away through three dances. The music of the fourth was just beginning when a curious young man appeared to find out what was this unusual attraction that was holding his fastidious friend thus enthralled.

But, alas for Althea! Her new triumph turned to ashes in her mouth when she found herself whirled about in the arms of the second youth. Which was he? His name meant nothing to her, and yet some comfort came to her as she realized that by a process of elimination he could be but one of two things. Was he the dancer or the prancer? There was a kind of breezy strength about him, but his eyes were deep and almost dreamy, and rarely had she danced with anyone so lightly graceful. Desperately she was about to try the "eeny, meeny, mo" method of decision, when most unexpectedly he took the matter from her hands.

TYPES

"You know," he said boyishly, "I've met you before. Oh, not really introduced," he went on hastily, seeing the look of bewilderment in her eyes, "but I saw you at the Derby horshow last week. I was standing right near you, so I could see how interested you were in horses and all. They are great sport."

"Aren't they?" the girl breathed fervently a prayer of thankfulness in her heart. The prancer! And here, surely, she was on familiar ground. She was all sparkle, all unaffected interest. She forgot it was one of Hilton's social lions with whom she was talking, and remembered only that here was a very wide awake young man who enjoyed the same things as she, and most apparently enjoyed discussing them with her.

THE night was warm, and when the music died away, they strolled out to the wide porch, and they argued with friendly heat over various questions of sport.

Here they were found at last, and Althea was laughingly stolen away from her reluctant partner.

The wine of success had mounted to her head. She was popular. The three social arbiters had marked her out for their special admiration and attention. Around the room as she whirled past, she could hear whispered comment. And now the strain was over. This must be the dancing man. Two from three leaves one. He did dance divinely, though she had had no fault to find with her last partner. She looked at him questioningly. Should she venture her opinion on aesthetic movement? She felt suddenly a little tired. The music was exquisite, alluring, and with a soft little sigh she gave herself up to the joy of it. Words died on her lips. The music swayed. They just danced.

MRS. CLARENDON was again pouring her perfect tea, from her perfect tea service with the same perfect grace, but to-day her audience had changed. Three correctly garbed young men now sat at her shrine, and with one accord demanded:

"Where did you get her?"

Mrs. Clarendon's most rigid principle was never to be surprised at anything.

"Get her?" she murmured, faintly it's true.

"Althea," they cried.

"Althea," echoed Jerry Paxton,

"she saved my life. Never did I meet such a crowd of brainless girls! Polo, horses; horses, polo, everyone, and not one knew a thing about what they were talking. I was about to gallop from the room when I met Althea, and she, who really is a horsewoman, and knows a thing or two about sports, talked of everything but that. Jove, she's a splendid talker! We got on books, or something like that, anyway it seemed about a minute when old Jack came along and spoiled the party."

"Spoiled the party! Gad, man, if I hadn't, I'd be a raving maniac by now. Everyone of those awful girls seemed to have dancing on the brain. I expounded the history of dancing from ancient Egypt down to Gertie Hoffman and then some. I showed them all the new steps I knew, till I found myself fox-trotting home when the darn show was over. Do you blame me for trying to find a real girl? I saw her at the horse show last week. She looked bully then, but not a patch on what she really is. We'd be talking polo yet, if Forman hadn't busted in."

Peter groaned gently.

"Men, what I suffered last night is locked in my own heart. They gave me literary indigestion. I played up to all their bait on current topics; current poetry; we wandered into ancient lore and down the ages, till I felt like a worm—book-worm, you understand—and no man. I was on the point of crawling from that chamber of horrors, when Althea swam into my ken. And she is a star. But I beat you fellows all to a finish. We didn't talk at all. We just danced. It was the most perfect silence I've ever enjoyed."

Make Your Own Furniture

THINK of the thousands of new summer cottages which will be taking shape all over our beautiful countryside and beside lake, river and mountain in the next few weeks. And each of these little temporary homes will require furniture and fittings suited to its location and the needs of its occupants.

If you are one of these fortunate builders, have you given a thought to how easily you could make your own furniture rather than purchase the ordinary cheap articles which are so prevalent in the summer bungalow? Think, also, of the saving in dollars, for even the poorest of furniture in these days requires a considerable outlay.

Beginning in the June Number, there will be a series of articles on the making of furniture, the first telling the beginner how to go about his work, what woods to buy and what tools he will require. Each succeeding article will give plans and designs and complete instructions for the making of different pieces of furniture.

Mrs. Clarendon was a pale gray by now. Her breath was coming in short gasps, as she watched them drain her priceless nectar with awful indifference, and then rise with one accord.

"Where are you going?" she whispered faintly.

"To Althea's," they cried in chorus. "We're in to the finish."

THE END.

How Canadian Parks Can Contribute to the Health and Happiness of the Children of the Dominion

The article which the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL prints herewith was written by George W. Perkins, President New York State Commission of the Palisades Interstate Park. Mr. Perkins is known throughout the North American Continent as the projector of the most important park development ever attempted. In addition to his many contributions to social service and his busy political life, Mr. Perkins has found time to develop the Palisades Park as the most widely used and most socially grounded park development on the continent. It is in the suggestiveness of the matter—in what Canadians can do in the same direction with their own parks—that Mr. Perkins' article becomes an important contribution to the social welfare of Canadian children.—The Editor.

The problem in national arithmetic: Tenement boys minus sunlight, fresh air, wholesome play, plus forest land, trees, rocks, lakes, plus food, leadership, etc., equal good citizenship.

Some forest land—a bit of ingenuity. Presto! a joy forever.

Sturdy bodies—steady hands—keen minds. These are products of the rational use of forest lands for recreation.

JUST suppose your father was dead and your mother worked in a factory all day to support you and your brothers and sisters.

Just suppose that when school closed you had to sell newspapers late into the night in order to help mother so that there would be enough food for all the little mouths at home.

Just suppose that you were sometimes hungry and that you knew that mother and the others were hungry too, because there was not enough money to feed everyone.

Just suppose that you watched with wistful eyes how other children played and you could not play as hard because you were not strong.

Just suppose one day during the hot summer, you were suddenly taken away from the hot city streets, and put on board a steamboat or a train.

Just suppose that as soon as you arrived you were placed on a real automobile and whisked away through wonderful mountain scenes until you arrived at a beautiful gem-like lake.

Just suppose that there was real food three times a day and bathing in the clear lake,—not off the dock.

Just suppose that there were real ball games—without any "Bobbies" to chase you.

Just suppose that you could run about on the cool grass in your bare feet without stumbling over the "Keep Off the Grass" sign.

Just suppose you heard real birds singing and went rowing and hiking and you sat around a real wood fire—and you did not have to turn your head to see whether the "Bobby" was after you.

Just suppose that you, who read this, are a stockholder in a corporation which has for its chief purpose, whisking away little boys and girls on a magic carpet from their wretched tenement environments to a paradise, would you not feel as though the dividends in happiness, strength and inspiration were worth more to you than the returns from corporations whose sole object is producing profits? The corporation engaged in the business of making people strong and happy in this way has for its stockholders every citizen of the State of New York and New Jersey and the name of the corporation is the Palisades Interstate Park.

This corporation to promote happiness has shown the way to engage in the business of bringing smiles to sad faces, sparkle to children's eyes, the ruddy glow of health to pallid cheeks.

Children, like trees, grow straight and beautiful if nurtured properly.

HOW would you, as a citizen of the Province, like to be a stockholder in such an enterprise? If you would—you could, by utilizing the public parks of the Province in the way in which the Palisades Park has been used and developed by the people of the States of New York and New Jersey.

The Commissioners of the Palisades Park are trustees of land set aside for park purposes. They are unpaid and non-partisan public spirited citizens appointed by the Governor. It is interesting to note here that while this work is being done under the auspices of the State, only 45 per cent. of the money spent on its development during the past twenty years has come from the States, while 55 per cent. has been donated by private individuals.

Thus the State receives through private donation money from interested citizens to further this work.

THE little lad of whom we speak is only one of nearly 60,000 who spent an average of eight days each in the section of the park during the 1919 season. Throughout the park, the lakes, many of which have been made by the commission, have been developed into little summer communities, for under-privileged children. Here in rustic pavilions which jut out into the lake, the children live. These cabins have been built of the dead chestnut in the forests of the park and have been constructed with a view to all the comforts consistent with real camping. The children sleep in these cabins, sheltered by the glistening pines. The types of children who come are best indicated by a few of the names of organizations which have camping privileges in the park: namely, Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, with its under-nourished children from homes of poverty; Industrial School for Destitute and Homeless Orphans; Big Brother movement with its group of children who were recruited from the juvenile courts and evil environments of city streets; the Hebrew Orphan Asylum where those deprived of the loving care of natural parents found pleasant contrast to the monotony of their institutional life—and forty other institutions of this kind.

Suffice it to say, that, through the careful planning of the commission, the orphan, the crippled, the blind, the aged, the overworked factory girl, the tired tenement mother and the lusty boy scout have all found accommodations in this State playground.

Fifty orphans from a camp out for a hike on the park drive.

How They Live in Paradise.

THESE camps are all under the supervision of people expert and capable in the art of making children happy. Definite programmes are followed, which encourage habits of cleanliness and the formation of good character building. The central theme of life in a camp is the happiness of the child, thus ample provision is made for rowing, swimming, games, story-telling, hikes, moving pictures, etc.

The health of this huge army requires the constant application of every principle of hygiene which the commission observes scrupulously, at the same time developing life-saving corps, teaching children to swim and giving them the rudiments of life in the open for the protection of the body as well as its development.

Feeding the Babes.

ONE of the interesting developments in the co-ordination of the work has been in the feeding of campers. It has long been apparent to those interested in the out-of-doors that not infrequently the beneficent effects of out-of-door life is vitiated by the poor selection and poor quality of camp food. To obviate this, the commission has made a careful study of the food needs of children living an out-of-door life. A standard dietary was therefore prepared which provided each child a minimum of 2,500 calories of food per day. The large food manufacturing facilities at Bear Mountain Inn, operated by the commission, were then harnessed to this service and food for most of the camps is prepared at Bear Mountain Inn and sent in heat-retaining vessels to the camps by automobile, most of the camps being seventeen miles from the Inn. Three years of this system has verified its practicability and value and it is not surprising to learn that this co-ordination on a large scale has made it possible to supply 21 meals per week per child for $4. Thus the temperament of cooks, the lack of uniformity in the manner of the food they prepare and the waste in small kitchens have all been dissipated.

The Road to Paradise.

THE accessibility of the Palisades Park to more than half of the population of the city of New York makes it of peculiar importance as a recreational area. Yet even such accessibility with the high cost of traveling, would make this an unattainable paradise if it were not for the fact that the commission has through various methods, made it possible for its campers to come to any camp in the park for a low fare.

Some Angels in Paradise.

OF course, all of the angels in this paradise are not the children. There are many persons whose interest in the park is so great that they devote a good part of their time to making these children happy with no hope or expectation of reward. Thus we have had prominent song leaders, who have conducted songs with the children; the band of the Hebrew orphan asylum spent the entire summer in camp playing on the lakes for the children; a prominent Russian violinist, Miss Nathalie Boshko, devoted her entire summer playing in the working girls' camps; a talented harpist and vocalist, Miss Ruth Linrud, spent her entire summer going from camp to camp bringing the pleasure of the best music to those who have had little or

Evelina: The History of Her Heart

THIRD PHASE

By Isabel Ecclestone Mackay

ILLUSTRATED BY MARION LONG

In Which Evelina Resolves Never Again to Believe in Womankind

OW foolish it is to think of nothing but young men! How unnecessary to think of young men at all—or old men either for that matter.

A woman who is truly a woman should be self-sufficing. Miss Robson says that until women are self-sufficing they will never get anywhere. And I agree with her.

Father said, "Where do they want to get?" Miss Robson just gave him that delicious little smile of hers.

"Women are all over the place now," said father.

"Not yet, but soon," said Miss Robson, and then she blushed and looked so distressed. She hadn't realized that it was slang. Henrietta (she lets me call her Henrietta when we are alone) never uses slang. She despises it and besides in her position it would never do. She is English and Moderns at the St. Hilliar Girls' School and of course those little wretches would just love to catch her out. "Catch her out" is slang too, I suppose, but it doesn't matter in a diary.

SIX months ago, after Mr. Andison went away, I felt awfully fed up. I mean I felt very tired of diaries, but since I have known Henrietta I have felt more and more the necessity of writing about her. One can talk, of course, but often people do not seem to take a vital interest. They would if they knew Henrietta as well as I do. But she has few intimates.

I count my friendship with her as my greatest privilege. She is a wonderful woman. Really she is the most fascinating thing! And her mind! Her mind is marvelous. It makes ordinary people feel quite ashamed of theirs. Even I feel quite diffident at times. And that is why, although we are so intimate, I have never told her about this diary or about it being a history of my heart. I am sure she would not approve of a heart having any history; not until it was a very mature heart anyway. And no doubt she would despise my weakness with regard to Mr. Andison. It was weakness. I realize that now. But I was so young. It is fully six months ago. And he really was a personality. Even father admits that.

Oh, what a blot! I knew I shouldn't have begun to write about Mr. Andison. Even now I feel like crying sometimes when I think of him. He was so—so different. I never saw him after that last lesson. But on the day he left town he called and gave mother a little parcel for me. Such a darling chain of silver and blue enamel, with the duckiest little blue enamel heart. Father says it is very old and probably valuable. He didn't altogether like my taking it. But mother said it was quite all right.

"There are ways of giving things!" said mother. And father said "Hum!"

I LOVE that blue enamel chain, even if it is weakness. But I am not wearing it just now. It is part of the Past. Part, I might say, of my girlhood, for I am a woman now. And a woman, thanks to Henrietta Robson, with a growing sense of the glorious mission of womanhood. I doubt if anyone save myself realizes the change in me. Even mother does not seem to see much difference. These psychic changes are most subtle things. I tried to explain it to mother. But she misunderstood entirely. I had been talking about my increased sense of responsibility and my enlarged outlook, hoping to give her some idea of how far I had progressed, but her only response was to offer to let me take over the housekeeping for a month or two.

"I don't think you are quite ready for it yet, Lina," she said, "but if you feel that way I don't mind letting you try—and I shall be here, of course, if you need me."

Fancy!

I had to explain that housekeeping, as such, was a very small thing. And that one of the mistakes of women in the past had been the undue magnifying of its importance. I could do it, of course, if I felt it worth while. Running a house must be child's play to a capable woman. One simply evolves a system and sticks to it. It should be quite easy. Henrietta says it is really pitiful the way old-fashioned housekeepers dissipate their energies.

HENRIETTA did not mean to refer to mother as one who dissipates her energies. She thinks mother is rather a wonder. And she is quite fond of her. But when they are together they never argue or reason—they just talk. And one day mother actually offered to teach Henrietta to knit. Fancy! I explained to mother that teaching the "English and Moderns" of St. Hilliar School to knit would be like using Niagara to turn a child's wind-mill—I mean mill-wheel.

A WEEK later.

I have been reading this over and I find that I have not yet explained Henrietta—her presence in our small town, I mean. Naturally, there are not many like her here. She came to us with the establishing of the St. Hilliar School for girls. It is a very select school. The Miss St. Hilliards are English ladies who bought the Lyttleton place and turned it into a school, boarding and day, run on the best English lines. It is something quite new for this part of the country and many people said it would never do. They said that Canada was far too democratic and that there is no real aristocracy here. But St. Hilliar has a long waiting list already. And the girls swank it frightfully.

All the teachers in the school are English, except one who is French, and, although it seems odd, I don't believe I ever met real English people before. There are plenty of people in town who speak with what we always thought was an English accent. But the St. Hilliar ladies speak quite differently. Their accent makes the other kind sound affected and absurd.

N.B.—I am glad now that mother would never let me try to talk like that. "You are a Canadian, Lina," she said, "be content to talk like one." Mother often has quite sensible ideas.

But to get back to Henrietta. It was her delightful voice which attracted me to her at first—afterwards it was the things she said. I had many opportunities of meeting her because the town made quite a little social flutter over the arrival of the St. Hilliar ladies. They are all nice and unusual, but both mother and I like Miss Robson best; my only trouble is that she is kept so busy at that horrid school and I am rather rushed too helping mother for we have done a lot of entertaining lately on account of Uncle Jack, who has to be livened up.

I HAVEN'T written about Uncle Jack before, so, although he isn't very important, I had better say that he is mother's youngest brother who is an experimental chemist or something and has had his eyes hurt by an explosion. He came down a month ago to visit us and to rest his eyes. He is nice, of course, and would be good-looking if it weren't for his dark glasses. But I can't say that he is much fun. When I say anything particularly striking he has the horrid way of whistling a note or two in an enquiring manner which is nothing less than rude. Otherwise he is rather quiet and old-fogeyish. All the girls are frightfully disappointed in him. He simply won't play tennis, and declares that his brain is still too sound for golf. The only exercise he seems to care for is walking. He walks and walks. Katherine Ripley, who isn't easily discouraged, offered to walk with him once. But she only succeeded in spoiling her boots and her temper. She says he forgot she was there.

I have walked with him, too, and I know what she means. But being his niece I have to put up with it, I want to be nice to him for mother's sake, but I must admit I find him hard to talk to. He won't talk. One day I asked him why. And he said he was too busy thinking. I asked him gently if that were not rather selfish. I did a lot of thinking myself, I said, but I did not let it interfere with my conversation. He said, "Quite so" and whistled that horrid little tune which always seems to end in a question mark. Then, seeing how rude I thought him, he tried to smooth things over by adding, "Time enough yet, Lina. You'll get to the thinking stage soon enough." Even after that I was patient with him—on account of mother.

"You make the usual mistake, Uncle Jack," I said coldly. "Because I am a woman you look upon me as your mental inferior. You are mistaken. My reasoning powers are fully equal to your own."

I saw that he was going to whistle, so I went on rapidly.

"Women have been kept in bondage so long," I explained, "that for the ordinary man's attitude there is some excuse. But there is no excuse for a man whose privilege it might be to associate with a woman like Henrietta Robson—"

"Do you think she would?" asked Uncle Jack unexpectedly.

"Would what?"

"Associate with me?"

"I'm sure she would do her best," I told him. "Though, since you ask me, I admit that she is used to the company of very brilliant people."

"She might like a change," said Uncle Jack hopefully.

I did not wish to discourage him. So I said that Henrietta found one of her greatest joys in being of use to people. "Look what she has done for me," I said. "Changed me in a few short weeks from a silly giggling girl into a serious, determined woman. But on you, so far, she seems to have had no effect at all. You have talked with her, you have heard her speak in public, and in private you have heard her simply wipe the floor with father on the woman question, yet you remain entirely unchanged. It shows that you have a closed mind, and a closed mind soon becomes a dead mind."

His lips began to pucker up, but I rushed on determinedly. "Take her views on the question of marriage—"

Just here my boot lace came untied and, would you believe it?—he never offered to tie it. But I could see that my words had stirred him. He looked almost eager.

"Yes—go on!" he said. "Let's take them."

"Take what?"

"Miss Robson's views on marriage."

"Oh, yes. Well, they are simply fascinating. They have given me an entirely new conception of the whole matter."

I glanced at him under my eyelashes because I have noticed that whenever a girl begins to speak about views on marriage, all her relatives begin to sit up and take notice. And I was right, for Uncle Jack had quite a human and interested expression—except for his glasses. He even condescended to prompt me—

"New—in what way?"

"Oh—just new. Henrietta sees, of course, that it's all wrong, as at present constituted, I mean. She doesn't exactly object to marriage, as marriage."

"What does she object to it as?"

THIS was a trifle difficult: Uncle Jack has a provoking way of asking questions which are different from what one expects. Naturally, I could not tell him offhand and in one word just all the complicated objections to marriage which have been formulated by the brightest minds of our pioneer women! I explained this.

"Hang your brightest minds!" said Uncle Jack quite violently. "We were talking about Henri—about Miss Robson, not about pioneer women. Why do girls never by any chance keep to the subject? What I want to know is, what has she got against marriage—anything personal? Anything to prevent her marrying, herself?"

"Henrietta will never marry," I said firmly. "She could never, never submit to the present humiliating conditions. And neither could I. I have quite decided."

I expected that this would bring a torrent of remonstrance. But Uncle Jack was looking abstracted.

"Imagine me marrying any of the men I meet around here?" I went on. Then, as I saw a whistle coming, "Imagine a woman like Miss Robson married to a man like Dr. Morris—"

"What?" said Uncle Jack. He said it so suddenly and so loudly that I jumped, but his very agitation proved my point.

"Even you can see how distressing such an idea would be," I added mildly.

"Morris is an ass!"

"Please don't be violent, Uncle Jack. Dr. Morris may be an ass but he wants to marry Henrietta. Anyone can see that."

"But she—does she—"

"She does not," I assured him with coldness. "She wouldn't think of it."

Uncle Jack came a little nearer to me. He even put his hand on my arm in a kind of coaxing way, for which I could see no reason.

"Lina," he said, "you're an observant kid—sometimes. Can you tell me what it is that she dislikes about Morris?"

"He wears spats!" I said.

The moment I had said it, I saw what I had done! What could I have been thinking of to blunder like that? It was true, of course. I knew by instinct that it was Dr. Morris's spats which Henrietta simply couldn't stand. But I ought to have been shot before I would have admitted it. Somehow it sounded so—so trivial. Uncle Jack would be sure to whistle. But he didn't. He didn't seem to notice what an opening I had given him. Instead he seemed more abstracted than ever and muttered something which sounded like "Sensible girl."

I drew a breath of relief. But it had been a near thing and I could not feel quite easy, so I added hastily, "I'm really not competent to explain things to you quite fully, Uncle Jack, but I'll ask Henrietta to tell you herself just how she looks upon marriage. She won't mind. She never spares herself where the good of the cause is in question. If I can assure her that you are interested—"

"You can," said Uncle Jack.

I felt that my words had not been wasted.

Memo—To ask H. to speak to U. J.

A WEEK later.

Sometimes I think that I do not quite understand Henrietta and yet she seems so simple, so single souled. I could swear that she cares for nothing save the sacred cause of womanhood, yet there are inconsistencies that puzzle me.

I have asked her to explain her views on marriage to Uncle Jack, and she has refused. I can't understand it. I explained to her how interested he was becoming and how eager he was to have her explain personally how she felt about this important question—and she actually tried to change the subject. It is the first time I have ever known Henrietta to shrink from any kind of pioneer work.

I told her I realized that it would not be pleasant or easy to argue with anyone as pig-headed as Uncle Jack, but I gently reminded her that we women must be willing to do unpleasant work occasionally—spade work, as it were.

But she still seemed strangely reluctant to do spade work on Uncle Jack.

"You see, I know him so well!" she objected.

I pointed out that this circumstance was favorable rather than otherwise. "You can talk to him intimately in a way you could not possibly do to a stranger," I said.

But she set her lips in that rather adorable way she has and said, "If you don't mind, Lina, I'd rather not."

I did mind, I minded very much, not for my own sake, nor for the sake of Uncle Jack (who doesn't count, really) but for her own sake entirely. Henrietta has always seemed so finely brave—so unafraid. I understand that once she spoke quite firmly to a bishop who was a terrible reactionary. I am not English Church myself, but Katherine Ripley is, and she says that speaking firmly to a bishop takes some spunk. In fact, spunk is the one thing which Katherine admits that Henrietta has. And now if she finds out that Henrietta is afraid of Uncle Jack I shall feel too humiliated! And she is the kind of girl who finds things out by instinct.

Katherine, I am sorry to say, is the only one in our set who has not come under Miss Robson's influence. She admits that she is pretty and that her voice is delightful and that she has stunning good style. But farther than that she won't go. She says that those three things are the ultimate anyway. I am disappointed in Katherine. She is so frivolous herself that it warps her judgment, and I haven't forgiven her for the cartoon she drew of Henrietta in which she (Henrietta) is depicted as ascending a triumphal staircase every step of which is a man's head. And the faces of the men are all vaguely familiar—Professor Black, Dr. Morris, Mr. Wallace and even Uncle Jack. Under the cartoon is printed Miss Robson's beautiful motto, "Every step upward!"

I didn't laugh.

I pointed out to Katherine that things like that are only clever when they are true.

"Then that is the cleverest thing I've ever done!" said Katherine.

We did not speak for a week after that.

But I am worried, really worried.

NEXT day.

I have spoken to mother about it. About Henrietta acting so strangely I mean. To my surprise, mother did not seem to think it at all odd.

"But, mother," I said, "can you see any reason why she should not wish to explain her views on marriage to Uncle Jack?"

Mother took up her sock and began to knit. "Why yes, I can, Lina," she said. "I think her reason is quite plain. She does not wish to give your Uncle Jack the opportunity of explaining his views on marriage to her."

THIS was a new and rather disturbing viewpoint. I hadn't thought about Uncle Jack's views. Even if he had any they were sure to be wrong. Now it was evident that mother had also felt a doubt as to Henrietta's courage.

"Do you think she's afraid?" I asked point blank.

"I think it very likely."

"But she has never been afraid! Not even of a bishop!"

Mother shrugged her shoulders. Mother is very clannish. I shouldn't be surprised if she thinks Uncle Jack quite as important as the Pope.

"But it's absurd!" I went on. "Uncle Jack

A House Which Can Be Built For $8,000 (approximately)

By Clarence Thetford

$4000

IN Canada the increased desire for country life has of late given rise to an enormous demand for modest but well designed country and suburban houses.

For a house—small or of medium size—the prime requisite is simplicity. Obviously a "one material" house is more simple and satisfying to the eye than a house built of stone, brick, stucco and shingles. Besides being more economical, the "one material" house gains in character and dignity, for in working simply in one material there is less temptation to introduce meaningless ornaments, showy paint and superfluous mouldings. When possible, the materials to be obtained in the neighborhood are the most appropriate.

The second requisite for suburban houses is an attractive form. They should never be built on the plan of a square. A comparison of a square house of a given area with one that is oblong and of the same area will show that the oblong house not only gains in general exterior appearance, but permits of more exposure in the rooms.

The third requisite is a study of solids and voids and of grouping. As a rule the small or medium size house should be low or at least give the effect of being low. A house that sits high is never quite friendly to its garden or lawn. The principal feature of the country house is the roof, sheltering as it does the whole building and if properly handled conveying at once a feeling of homeliness.

If you want your house to have some real character, avoid pretence, ignore shams, prune and cut the superfluous. It should be significant of and adapted to the habits and life of its occupants and should obviously express its purpose.

A large living-room is much more acceptable to the average family than the same space cut up into a "parlor," a "reception room" and a useless hall. The accompanying plans show a house which has been planned to fulfil the ideas here expressed.

Entering from a large, airy veranda through a vestibule from which opens a coat room, you at once enter the large, well-lighted living-room. An excellent view of the gardens both front and side can be obtained from any portion of this

A large stone fire-place, built on the end wall of the room, gives a distinctive touch and harmonizes well with the tout ensemble.

The stairs ascend from the corner of the room opposite the entrance, and beside the door leading to the kitchen and the ample service porch, with its place for ice-box, and an entrance to the cellar.

The kitchen is well-lighted by two large windows, giving a good cross draught. Ample wall surface gives space for sink, ranges, ironing board, cupboards, etc.

The serving pantry is supplied with cupboards and the end toward the window is fitted with a table and benches, making an ideal dining alcove convenient to the kitchen and yet away from the heat and odors of the cooking. The dining alcove is a feature of the modern house which is becoming exceedingly popular. It simplifies the serving of the hurried breakfast and where there are small children, is almost indispensable.

The dining-room is square in plan and gives an opportunity to design a circular ceiling which should be very attractive and unusual as well.

The first floor has four bedrooms, a bathroom and ample closet space. The bedroom at the right has open fire place, and like the other rooms, is well-lighted and planned for the easy placing of furniture.

The Amateur Gardener's Busy Month: May

#2750 By
George Baldwin
F.R.H.S.

A good crop of bloom for a three-year-old plant of Delphinium.

THIS is the busiest month of the year. During the first part of the month all kinds of annuals must be sown in the open ground, the soil made fine and kept moist and shaded from intense sun. A cheesecloth roof will accomplish wonders, for plants started in flats, indoors or in frames, must be gradually hardened off, by being exposed to the open air and protection should be given from the mid-day sun.

The number of plants now found suitable for the summer beds is considerable, which makes the selection of the most worthy no light matter. The day of the Geranium is not yet past, for of all summer plants it is one of the brightest, and its reliability is beyond question. However, something must be done to relieve it of its formal aspect. Without suggesting any particular plan, I mention a few plants which if judiciously placed never fail to take away the chief objection in a bed of stiff and low growing plants. For this purpose standard grown plants are favorites, and standards can be had of Fuchsias, Heliotrope, Geraniums, and lemon scented Verbena. Other tall growing plants include the brilliant Cannas, Nicotiana, the silver leaved Centaurea Ragusina, Lobelia Cardinalis, Salvia Patens, and the symmetrical Kochia Tricophylla.

For charm, with easy management, we must turn to the many varieties, that are raised in the spring, or can be purchased for very little at planting time. All these are seen at their best when designs of a simple character are aimed at. Schemes that have for their object the massing together of a lot of plants differing in habit and time of flowering are seldom satisfactory; a better effect is assured by planting each bed with two or three varieties that can be relied upon to bloom at one and the same time. Asters are not always as good as they might be, as they have a knack in some soils of failing completely, but where they are known to do well they are useful. The single type is now much improved, and as both sections are to be had in most of the pleasing colors, some interesting combinations may be arranged. An effective way of using two varieties is to edge the bed with Violas the same color as one in the centre.

DIMORPHOTHECA AURANTIACA is fine with its orange scarlet flowers. It is seen at its best on a sunny bank, or as an edging to a bed of dwarf white Antirrhinum. Nemesias are excellent bedding plants, and with the colors ranging from cream to scarlet, with also a pleasing blue variety, nothing more is needed for a bed beyond an edging of Alyssum Little Gem, or any other dwarf edging plant. Antirrhinums in the most brilliant colors and ranging in height from six inches to two feet, lend themselves to any scheme. A pleasing effect is gained by planting round a ring of Nicotiana Affinis a good breadth of some tall, dark variety. Phlox Drummondii is a showy bedder that never appears to more advantage than when massed together.

The English Telegraph Cucumber growing in a home-made greenhouse 9' x 12'.

Verbenas are similar in habit of growth, and seldom does a bed of them need any other occupant, for if they are kept neatly pegged down they soon become a mass of color. Salvias make a fine show when well grown. For this purpose the variety Fireball is excellent. French and African Marigolds are not to be despised, in company with the free flowering Cosmos. Annual Chrysanthemums are also worthy of extensive planting, as they are graceful and flower freely.

All the above require a certain amount of heat to bring them on, but there are some showy annuals that will give entire satisfaction sown in the position in which they are to bloom. Some of the best include Clarkias, Calliopsis, Godetias, Nasturtiums, Shirley Poppies, Bartonia Aurea, Candytuft, and Annual Larkspur, and for fragrance the Virginia Stock and Mignonne should not be overlooked. The latter, when planted near the sweet scented Ten-week Stock, provides a perfume during the warm summer evenings of a delightful nature.

Previous to planting out, see that all tender subjects are thoroughly hardened off, and the beds well dug and manured. If the soil is dry, give a good soaking with water a day or so before planting. In the case of all rank growing plants, such as Geraniums, Marigolds, and Antirrhinums, see that the soil is not made too rich, or growth instead of flowers will be the result.

The Dahlia lover is often anxious about his Dahlia cuttings, and he may welcome a few hints on the matter just now. It is of vital importance that good cuttings be secured, nice short sturdy growths some three inches long, and they must not be allowed to dry before they are inserted in the pots; any compost will serve to strike them in as long as it contains a goodly quantity of sand. Keep the cuttings close until top growth

The Chef's Secret

A Natural Sauce That All Homes Can Use

IN scores of recipes prized by famous chefs the flavor-secret is lemon juice. Lemon juice is often the added touch, the final refinement, the sauce that delights the connoisseur.

Note a few of the ways in which the chef uses the "Witching Drop of Lemon Juice."

In His Salad Dressings

He makes delicious dressings, both French and Mayonnaise, by using healthful lemon juice in place of vinegar.

He seldom serves fish, cold meats, or even tea, without a lemon garnish.

Thus he shows his high regard for lemons in these very simple uses.

And he serves lemon with these and other foods for more than flavor alone; for lemons aid him, as they will aid you, in even more valuable ways.

As An Appetizer

Pleasant digestion of his food-creations, as well as their flavors, is the chef's concern. And so it is every woman's, especially the mother's. Foods must be digestible, otherwise they disappoint.

Lemon juice—Nature's Sauce—is also one of Nature's best digestive aids, due to its organic salts and acids. So the dishes with lemon are not only better, but are better for you. We believe you will be glad to remember these facts when you plan your family's meals.

CALIFORNIA Sunkist Uniformly Good Lemons

In ordering, always ask for California Sunkist Lemons. They are juicy, tart, waxy, clean and bright, and practically seedless.

The crisp wrappers, stamped "Sunkist," mark the best lemons grown, yet they cost no more than others.

What C.N.I.B. Stands For

The Consideration of a Work, National in Scope and Individual in Sympathy

MORE than two years ago, a Dominion charter was secured for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, an organization which has developed through years of thought and striving on the part of those who have seen and felt the need of providing employment for those deprived of sight, and of using every safeguard of science to prevent blindness and to make the lot of those who work in darkness more varied and worth while.

Just at this point, let us admit our shortcomings and state that Canada has been slow to provide adequately for the training of the adult blind and had no truly Dominion-wide organization in operation until that March of 1918, when a charter was granted to the organization already mentioned, with Head Office at 36 King Street, East, Toronto. The work has progressed since then, with a steadiness which makes an ideal instance of a Forward Movement. In days like these, when we may wake up any morning to find that India is an Islam Republic and Ireland has foamed herself into one huge wave of revolt and been lost in the Atlantic, it is well to turn our thoughts from the destructive and the desolating and to dwell for a time on the projects of construction and reconstruction which are being carried out with earnestness and efficiency. Among these encouraging undertakings, in our community, may be counted this Institute, which already has inaugurated eleven departments of work, including Registration, Blinded Soldiers, Field Work, Industrial Department for Men, Home Teaching, Industrial Department for Women, Pearson Hall (a Residence for Blinded Soldiers in Vocational Training), Amalgamation of the Canadian National Library for the Blind (now the Library Department), Prevention of Blindness, Women's Auxiliary (an outgrowth of the Canadian Women's Association for the Welfare of the Blind), Salesroom Department. This, it will be admitted, is more than two years' work, and shows the result of a heartening combination of good feeling and effective action.

All the world knows the story of Helen Keller, the woman whose attitude towards physical handicap has been a reproach to the grumbler and an inspiration for the struggler. Miss Keller in one of her messages to the public, says: "The heaviest burden on the blind is not blindness, but idleness." The removal of this burden is one of the objects of the C.N.I.B.—and the establishment of industrial departments for blind workers throughout Canada is going far towards attaining that object. If we turn back to our own lives, to consider those who have been our best friends, our real inspirers, we find that they have been those who helped us to help ourselves, who gave us confidence in our own efforts and strengthened our determination to "carry on." There is no greater drawback to the development of character than self-pity, and idleness is inevitably an encouragement to indulge in a reflection on our own sorrows. Wherefore, those who know the cheering effect of "something to do" have an abiding belief in the happiness of the Employed.

THERE is much being done in this National Institute and so much developing every month that we might spend hours and pages on Pearson Hall, alone, or on the Library Department. As we are naturally more interested in the women's work, however, we shall devote our time and space particularly to what has been done for the women who have been deprived of sight. It is encouraging to note that in the days before the C.N.I.B. took unto itself a name and a Head Office, the women's organizations had begun to devote some of their public efforts to the work for the Blind. The Canadian Free Library for the Blind, originally existed in a private residence in Markham, Ontario, where Mr. E. B. F. Robinson, the first blind graduate of a Canadian University, who graduated from Trinity College with the highest honors, had his home. Mr. F. W. Johnson, a member of the Executive Council, and Mr. S. C.

Swift, now the Head of the Library and Publishing Department of The Institute, were also associated with early plans and dreams for a nation-wide movement for the education and training of the adult blind. All good Canadians know of the work of Sir Frederick Fraser, the blind superintendent of Schools for the Blind at Halifax. Mr. and Mrs. Philip Layton of Montreal have done excellent work in connection with the Montreal Association for the Blind and Mr. Joseph Beaubien, one of the honorary vice-presidents of the C.N.I.B., has been prominent in the administration of the Nazareth School for the Blind, which works among French-Canadians. The School for the Blind, at Brantford, is known throughout Ontario, and Mr. W. B. Race, the head of that institution, is a prominent member of the Council of the C.N.I.B. The Ottawa Association for the Blind, under Mr. J. L. Payne, did a good pioneer work for industrial training for the adult blind.

The projects of the C.N.I.B. have included, as a most important step, the formation of Divisions throughout the Dominion. The Western (including British Columbia and Alberta), with headquarters at Vancouver; the Central Western, (including Saskatchewan and Manitoba), headquarters at Winnipeg; the Ontario, with Toronto as headquarters; and the Maritime, (including New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island), with headquarters at Halifax, have already been formed. These Divisions have Industrial Departments for Men, while Ontario has an Industrial Department for Women, also—and the others will soon be similarly equipped. The Ottawa Association for the Blind has amalgamated and the Ottawa broom shop is now under the C.N.I.B.

Mr. L. M. Wood of Toronto, the president of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, who organized the Institute, is a business man of wide experience and yet wider sympathies, whose time and energy are always at the service of the Institute demands. The honorary vice-presidents, members of the Council and boards of management include the names of men prominent in financial, educational, medical and legal circles, from Cape Breton to Vancouver. The thoroughness and promptness with which these various Divisions have been formed, show the sincerity of the desire of those at the head of affairs to get the National Institute into the most efficient working order. There is the minimum of red tape and the maximum of achievement in the operations of such an organization.

IT is the Industrial Department for Women, as it is now seen at 40 Adelaide Street West, Toronto, that we should like you to know, for the work being done there by women without sight is a heartsome achievement. There was some difficulty in finding out the most feasible employment for the blind woman worker, as there was no department of labor recognized for her, to the same extent as broom-making is adopted as a suitable trade for the man deprived of eyesight. Now, we find at the Industrial Department for Women at Toronto, a vast array of aprons which are being made on machines, most of which are attached to a shaft, although two are kept for practice for new workers. Hundreds of aprons are now being ordered weekly by a department store, and restaurant uniforms form another substantial order from these busy workers. After all, this making of aprons is an entirely natural and essentially feminine undertaking. The Mother of us all, in her first industrial efforts, made for herself an apron of fig leaves, and has left to all her daughters a fondness for the fabrication of aprons, which are an indispensable part of the wardrobe, especially in these days of "Help Wanted." There are aprons of varying shapes and sizes, from the dainty affair, which is meant rather for ornament than protection, to the bungalow variety, which is equal to the morning's work.

Then, there is the rug-weaving to be seen; and the looms carry one back to the old farm scenes and spacious firesides, where many a family gathering took place. These are very up-to-date and modern looms and the workers learn with surprising rapidity how to manage them and guide the few operations necessary to transform the rags into rugs of pleasing color and texture. Most of the rags are the cuttings left over from the manufacture of the aprons and are of light coloring with blue or rose predominating. They are just the thing for a summer cottage and, in fact, would be a bit of brightness in any home. The prices are reasonable and these products should find a ready sale.

The supervisor of this department is Mrs. Clayton Ridge, who is assisted by Mrs. Fitzsimmons and Miss Thompson. The Institute has been fortunate in securing this staff, for each member of it shows an alertness and sympathy which cannot fail to call forth the best efforts of the workers. "Atmosphere" is a curious thing which defies definition—and yet even the casual visitor knows whether it is one of healthy encouragement or of depression—and the atmosphere of these work-rooms is both kindly and bracing. The workers are given every needed assistance, but the object of the instruction is to increase their self-confidence and the worker is encouraged to depend on herself, as soon as the running of the machine has been mastered. Suggestion, which is such a valuable psychological force, does much towards successful

The Prestons

By Mary Heaton Vorse

The Delicate Task of Disengaging an Engaged Couple Falls to the Lot of the Two Families, Mutually Agreeable

"I'm perfectly sure that before Berenice began making a fuss over that stray pup, Osborn had hardly noticed her as for her noticing Osborn of course she had. They'd been at school together. Osborn, by virtue of being captain of the high school baseball team, was naturally the most prominent boy. So I should like to know exactly why Berenice should have made a friend of a girl so much younger than herself as Edith."

The dog, recognizing a friend, crept close to Berenice and put his head on her knees. She smoothed his ears down and felt him over with a hand that was far more practised than Osborn's. She lifted her round eyes:

"Don't you think," she asked my son, "he'd like a drink of water? You told me one time that lost dogs were not half as hungry as they were thirsty."

"Get some water," said Osborn shortly, and Jimmie obeyed like the arrow from the bow.

Jimmie returned with a dipperful, and the dog began lapping greedily. I was about to go my way when Seraphy hove in view.

"Aha!" she cried. "And that's what you was wantin' my dipper for, Jimmie! Ain't it enough for ye to be stuffin' all the cake on me down your throat without usin' me own tin dipper that I drink out of meself fur dogs that might have the hydrophobia, fur all you know—and slobbering of it he is, Mis' Preston, all over the new front rug! You can jest march along, Jimmie, and use the sapolio on that dipper under me eye. Ain't what Piker drinks out of good enough for stray dogs? Ain't the back woodshed a good enough place for dogs to be drinking anyhow?" Seraphy demanded belligerently.

"Oh, dry up, Seraphy," Osborn gave out. Seraphy beamed at Osborn. "That dog's going to live in college with me."

"Oh," replied Seraphy. "I didn't know it was your dog, Osborn. I've got some cake new baked," she added invitingly.

CHAPTER LXI.

BERENICE continued to pet the dog.

"You'll come to-night, won't you, Edith?" Marion asked.

"I told Arthur Taylor I'd be home," Edith said doubtfully.

"Oh, Arthur Taylor!" said Marion. "Send him a note you can't see him!"

"I think," said Osborn at supper that evening, "that when a girl makes an engagement with a fellow, she ought to keep it."

"You're consistent, aren't you Osborn?" Edith replied with sarcasm. "I thought you couldn't stand Arthur Taylor, and now, just because I'm sending Jimmie with a note to tell him not to come, you get awfully moral all of a sudden."

"There!" said he. "Isn't that like a girl? They haven't any principle; that's what ails 'em, and that's really what makes fellows hate 'em so."

"Huh!" said Jimmie, who has lately in our family been left out of things more and more. "Much fellows hate girls!" Osborn ignored his younger brother's sneer.

"They put everything up to personality and not to principle. If I like Ratty Taylor, I ought to think that looking an engaged fellow with him is a crime. If I don't like him, I ought to think it's a virtue."

"Well," said Edith hotly, "don't you think you ought to want to do more for the people you like than for the people you don't like?"

"I think," said Osborn, "you ought to be able to know your own mind. I don't see how your liking him or not liking him has anything to do with keeping your engagements."

"He ought to be grateful I'm kind to him at all," said Edith.

"He ought to be grateful," Osborn assented, "that he's allowed to live on the earth—that nobody's stepped on him by mistake; but I don't see what that has got to do with you, Ede. All I think is, it's due to yourself to keep your own appointments."

"Well," said Edith, "thank Heaven, I'm not a martinet!"

"Oh, you don't need to tell us," said Osborn, "that you thank Heaven daily that you're not as others are!"

Here Maria, anxious to allay hostilities, enquired:

"Why don't you want your little friend to come this evening?"

"She's giving her 'little friend' the kibosh," Osborn explained, "because of Marion—who else? Marion whistles and of course Edith has to go and dance. You may not be a martinet, Edith, but you haven't got any more independence than a rabbit!"

In the brutality of family life, a young girl's emotions are always being dragged out into the light of ribald discussion.

"That's right," said Jimmie. "Everything Marion says goes. Ever since Marion said my hair was red, Edith has gone around calling it auburn."

"So it is," said Edith. "I like auburn hair."

"Well, my hair won't change itself to please either Marion or you," said Jimmie. "It's chestnut; it isn't a bit redder than yours, Edith Preston!"

"I do think, Edith," said Maria, "that you are too much under Marion's influence. You just let her do your thinking for you."

"Just because Marion and I have the same opinions, it isn't any sign, Aunt Maria, that she does my thinking for me. Similar minds come to the same conclusions," replied Edith.

"Huh! You're a copy-cat," said Jimmie. "You've changed the way you do your hair."

"Anyway," Osborn joined in, "it's the high pressure of this friendship between girls that makes me tired. And they're not real friends, anyhow; they go together for a while, and then get mad at each other; and the more they used to like each other, the harder they scrap. It's going to be a fierce volcanic eruption all right when Marion and Ede bust."

"Osborn Preston," Edith said, and there was a hint of tears in her voice, "I won't have you talk like that."

Marion and I are never going to be separated—never!"

"I bet you they'll be pulling hair in two months!" said Jimmie the cynic.

"I bet you they will, too, kid," replied Osborn.

This was more than Edith could stand. It was as though a mother should have been joked about putting her son out-of-doors; it was as though the young bride should have had her divorce predicted for her, or the young girl in the first flush of her first love-affair had to look into the future and see a separation for a trivial cause staring her in the face. For all the poignant emotions that Edith had at this moment were summed up in her devotion to her friend Marion. It stood in her life for all the higher things; it was a symbol, the only door through which she might look as yet at the highest emotions of which the heart is capable; it was a sacred thing. At the boys' teasing, tears started to her eyes and being angry at herself, she vented it by saying:

"All the same, Osborn Preston, I'm going with Marion this evening, and I'm not going to see that Taylor boy," by which appellation Edith calls the young lad who formerly led her intellect into the land of poesy.

"Well," said Osborn, "I wish the girls were coming to-night, because some of the fellows said they'd be over, and Owen Greave is coming." He tried to let this last name drift from his lips in a casual sort of way. Owen Greave is the man of his class every one praises. He is the coming man in athletics; he is the sort of lad who has combined with real ability a certain magnetism that makes him adored by boys. He is the sort of boy who would be besieged by girls except that his lack of vanity kept him from observing anything but the most open attacks. For any boy to have Owen Greave at his house is like introducing the heir presumptive to the family circle.

At this information Edith's anger dropped like a hauled-down flag.

"Oh, I think Marion would love to meet him!" cried Edith. "Oh, Os, you're an old dear! I'll go through that call from that tiresome boy just to please you."

Osborn laughed. Edith, when not annoyed or self-conscious, has a beguiling manner.

"There," he said. "There, you see, mother. Nothing for principle, but everything for the affections."

"Well," said Henry, taking part in the conversation for the first time, for he had been apparently reading, "you can just thank your stars, son, that's the way women are built."

"Say, Ede," Osborn took advantage of his sister's soft mood to say, "I wouldn't go with that Belle Mather if I were you."

"I don't," replied Edith coldly.

"Well, I saw you on the street with her."

"What's the matter with Belle Mather?" I asked.

"You don't know how boys talk in college, mother," said Osborn. "There's nothing the matter with Belle, but she just gets too gay and the boys make remarks."

"She's nothing but a pretty, silly little thing," I suggested.

"That's just what Marion and I are trying to combat," said Edith heartily. "Girls are foolish because boys make them so. Belle's too good-tempered to keep fellows in their proper places, and then they go off and talk about her; and I think it's disgusting!"

"I don't like her bunch," said Osborn. "They act silly on the street, always waiting around for fellows. It was all right when you were a little girl, but now that you're beginning to know my friends—"

"You talk to them all right, Os," observed Jimmie.

"That's different," replied Osborn.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE evening passed off pleasantly except for poor Arthur Taylor, who was left in a corner to his own devices, and the next afternoon Marion and Edith were sitting reading on the piazza, and Maria and I were at a little distance sewing, when Maria threw out to Edith:

"Well, how did you like Mr. Greave? He wasn't as fascinating as I expected he would be. Just from the glimpse I had of him he seemed a little heavy and quiet."

Here Edith exclaimed: "I think he has more character, Aunt Maria, than any boy I've ever met."

"Yes," Marion corroborated. "You feel that he has depth." There was a different tone in the words of both toward young Greave than that in which they usually discuss boys.

"I did like his looks," said Edith.

"Well, he is not my idea of a handsome man," Maria said.

"I dislike handsome men intensely," said Marion. "There is something really disgusting to me about a man of whom one says at first sight, 'Isn't he good-looking?' I like a man to look manly!"

"And strong," Edith supplemented.

"Yet he ought to have the appearance of gentleness."

"The strongest men are always gentle and kind," Edith added.

I saw they were performing a little antiphonal chant in praise of Mr. Owen Greave. They were indeed singularly alike, as was proven by their both being touched more than they had ever been before, by the same boy.

I have observed that the happiest thing in young girls' friendships is when they both can be good friends with the other's sweetheart, but when each prefers a different type of man. But unfortunately Marion and Edith centred their attention on Owen, as I realized the day Owen made his first call. After the custom of indulgent American elders, Maria and I passed the time of day with young Mr. Greave, and then made excuses to leave the young people together. I ordered lemonade and cakes, and beckoned Jimmie away from his post of observation in the window, while Maria said to me:

"Did you see that? Those two girls are all of a flutter! I didn't think that Edith had it in her, nor Marion either. They've always acted as if they'd swallowed a ramrod. I must say I do think too much sangfroid is unbecoming in young girls. But to-day—"

What Maria had said was true; the

It is film that dims the teeth

It is the film-coat that discolours, not the teeth. When that film becomes cloudy, the teeth lose their lustre.

And that film is the cause of most tooth troubles.

See how the teeth glisten after ten days with Pepsodent. It will be a revelation.

In Striving For Beauty Remember the teeth

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Remove the film

Glistening teeth are essential to beauty. Do not overlook them.

That viscous film which you feel with your tongue, if left on teeth, becomes a dingy coat. It dims the lustre by absorbing stains. In places, often, it forms the basis of black tartar.

But it destroys more than tooth beauty. It causes most tooth troubles. Few people escape them who do not fight that film.

Over 98% affected

Among civilized peoples, statistics show that over 98 per cent. meet tooth troubles. And those troubles are constantly increasing.

Yet the tooth brush is used by millions. But the ordinary dentifrice does not dissolve film, so the tooth brush leaves much of it intact.

The film clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. Careful people twice a year have a dentist remove it by instruments or pumice. But in the meantime, night and day, it may do a ceaseless damage.

How film destroys

The film is what discolours—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. And that is alarmingly common.

Dentists long have known that film caused most of the tooth damage. They have known that brushing did not end it. So dental science has for years sought some way to combat it in the home.

The way is found

Now the way is found. It is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of pepsin is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

But pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed barred. Now science, however, has discovered a harmless activating method. Countless tests have proved this. Now active pepsin can be every day applied.

Three new methods

This active pepsin is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And able authorities recognize that this new tooth paste meets modern requirements.

It combines three great essentials, each of which aids tooth protection as no other method does.

* * * * *

For five years Pepsodent has been subjected to convincing tests. Every effect has been repeatedly proved with scientific care. Every action has been carefully studied.

Now leading dentists all over America are urging its adoption. Millions of teeth are every day benefited by it. And the use of Pepsodent, among careful people, is fast spreading the world over.

The test is free

To quickly make this method known, a 10-Day Tube is being sent to everyone who asks.

Every home should have it. Let someone use it, then watch results. Compare the teeth now with the teeth in ten days. The clear effects will show you quickly what is best for you and yours.

This is highly important. It may bring you priceless protection. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

White teeth everywhere now

Millions of teeth are now brushed with Pepsodent. You see them everywhere—white, glistening teeth.

But this means more than beauty. The teeth are cleaner and safer. The effects may be life-long and vital.

This ten-day test will show you why careful people everywhere now use this new-day method.

"I ended corns forever in this scientific way"

Millions have said that about Blue-jay.

Others tried it and told others the same story.

So the use has spread, until corn troubles have largely disappeared.

If you have a corn you can settle it tonight. And find the way to end every corn.

Apply liquid Blue-jay or a Blue-jay plaster. The pain will stop.

Soon the whole corn will loosen and come out.

Think what folly it is to keep corns, to pare or pad them, or to use the old harsh treatments.

Here is the new-day way, gentle, sure and scientific. It was created by a noted chemist in this world-famed laboratory.

It is ending millions of corns by a touch. The relief is quick, and it ends them completely.

Try it tonight. Corns are utterly needless, and this is the time to prove it.

As Between Friends

By Anne Elizabeth Melvin

When It's Apple Blossom Time In Canada

I WONDER if "Apple Blossom Time in Normandy" is one-half as beautiful as apple-blossom time in this wonderful Canada of ours. As I look out of my window I see in my garden trees white with bloom, like exquisite bridal bouquets—fragrant masses in which the bees bury themselves in an ecstasy of delight, drunk (even in these days of prohibitive sobriety) with the odors that sweep through the orchard. Here and there are trees of deeper pink where peach and plum sprinkle the ground with their fragrant petals. Close to the willows which bend over the stream, the lilac bushes are resplendent in their fresh green among which will soon wave plumes of purple and white. Across the river I see rows of blossom-laden trees which later will fill the pantry of my neighbor with preserves and jams that hold in their shimmering depths the essence of spring sunshine and vernal winds. By the mill-race, contented cows browse beneath fragrant hawthorn bushes, their tawny backs flecked with patches of sunlight and gently fallen bloom. A song-sparrow trills its roundelay from the cherry tree beside my pump, and Jenny Wren is scolding at the door of her house which looked so bleak and uninhabited during the winter months. The sun shines—the soft winds flutter the curtains beside my writing-table—I hear the voices of my boys at play, the fluting of a meadow lark in the grassy lane, the peep of baby chicks just learning the distinctive flavor of bug and worm. And this is May! Oh, it is good just to be alive and one forgets for the moment that there are such things as pain and sorrow and loss in the world.

No wonder that our poets break forth into rhapsodies and songs of spring. The most prosaic of us all must be thrilled by all the wonder of this budding time, the sweetness and the gladness of it all. I know just how my Jersey calf feels when it throws its hind legs into the air and to the amazement of its browsing ma dashes wildly around the enclosure. Had I hind legs as a means of expression I should do the same. As it is I jump up and down on my front ones (when my small fry aren't looking) and breathe hard through my nostrils just as Nancy Hanks does when my husband turns her out of the stable. And when Nancy rolls on the fresh green grass with queer snorts and grunts of pleasure I feel that I must go and do likewise. But—the neighbors! What might they say to see the dignified mother of a strident family of boys engaged in such gymnastics. No, decorum must be observed and my natural instincts curbed by the mandates of a civilization rigidly unsympathetic in its attitude towards the unconventional.

ONE can scarcely expect to be dignified and proper when all nature seems in a riotous mood—inconsequent, gay, rejuvenated. Even the clothes on the line fling their wobbly limbs in an abandonment at once grotesque and infectious. At present a suit of my husband's B.V.D.'s is disporting itself in a seductive manner and inviting a rakish garment of my own to join in the dance—a sort of May-day rhapsody that is well-nigh irresistible.

Did you ever notice the amount of personality and character displayed on the average family clothes-line? No two arrays are ever alike; the actions of garments, mentionable and otherwise, possess a thrilling uncertainty that never allows one's interest to flag. Even the smallest handkerchief waves hilariously before "skinning the cat" in brazen defiance of convention. Just watch your own line on a breezy day and the contortionist at the circus will pale into mediocrity beside the gymnastics that go on in your own back yard.

Speaking of May dances reminds me of that old poem that we used to learn at school, "For I'm to be Queen of the May, Mother, I'm to be Queen of the May." What visions of village gaiety and innocent fun were called up by those oft-repeated lines. I wonder if the crowning of the May-queen has quite died out in Old England or if in this prosaic day there are some sequestered villages where the beautiful ceremony is still carried on. So many of the quaint old customs seem to have given way to the more practical phases of life. I notice that this year Queen Mary did away with the customary feathers, veil, and train that marked former drawing-rooms. And how much of the picturesqueness of the scene has gone with them. One may now escape the nightmare of managing yards of shimmering silk while one makes one's bow before their Majesties, but I cannot think that the ceremony will be quite as imposing. Did you ever read Sara Jeanette Duncan's description of her presentation in "An American Girl in London?" Most graphically she portrays the tremors that filled the heart of a nervous debutante about to be presented, and her practice with a string of towels pinned together by way of train is very amusing.

AND in speaking of royalty I am reminded that the twenty-fourth of this month is Victoria Day. Some of the happiest memories of my childhood are centered around this historic date. Early in the morning we were awakened to the sound of fire-crackers and the refrain of that stirring and defiant song of childhood, "Twenty-fourth of May's the Queen's birthday, if you don't give us a holiday we'll all run away!" The threat was never carried into execution for it always was a holiday and the noisiest, jolliest one, barring Christmas, in the whole year. To me there was always a sort of mystic sacredness about the day and my heart used to travel across the seas to where that wonderful little lady lived and moved and had her being. She was such a perfect combination of dignity and simplicity, of true queenliness and evident womanliness. All the doings of those thrilling Queen's Birthdays had a personal element in them that has been lacking since the tired little body was laid to rest after its long life of a mingled pain and happiness such as fell to the lot of the most ordinary of her subjects. She seemed such a dear, grandmotherly sort of person in spite of the heavy crown that on occasions sat so regally upon her head. And now that she has gone we celebrate the day that has been set apart for all time in honor of Victoria the Good, but only those who were fortunate enough to live during even a part of her reign can know what it meant when the raison d'être of our picnics, our bonfires, our rockets, our bands and our parades, was herself taking part in the world's activities and bearing her share most nobly beneath the light that beats so mercilessly upon a throne.

Victoria the Good—and she was good—

"Her court was pure; her life serene; God gave her peace; her land reposed; A thousand claims to reverence closed In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen."

And though we may laugh at certain restrictions, at certain expressions of what in these days is considered the execrable taste of the Victorian era, we cannot but wish that some of the tranquillity and peace and solidity of that Golden Age were with us.

I WONDER who gave May a black eye by inventing that familiar couplet, "Marry in May, you'll rue the day." Certainly no month in the year is a sweeter one in which to start one's married life than this one—unless it is October which to my mind is best of all. I have known several May marriages which have been eminently satisfactory. My own father and mother chose that time and I think their married life had in it few regrets or tribulations—unless I myself may be regarded as a tribulation. It is too beautiful a month to be held in disfavor. It should be associated with gladness, flowers, blossoms and fairy rings.

And fairy rings brings me to a question of interest that is receiving some attention on the other side of the border.

This is no other than the suppression of fairy stories as detrimental to the character of our children. Personally I think this is absolute bosh. It would be little short of criminal to deprive our young people of what brought to us in

A Health Talk to Mothers Regarding the Important

FIRST TROUBLES

By Dr. Laura S. M. Hamilton

"FIRST trouble is least trouble," said a professor to a student, when the latter was complaining over the endlessness of certain routine.

"First trouble is least trouble," the man sick with pneumonia might aptly remark as he thinks of the neglected cold that brought it all about.

"First trouble is least trouble." How often have the words recurred to me as I have struggled with a sick baby, tried to strengthen and cheer the worn-out mother and comfort the frightened father, knowing all the time that the whole illness and anxiety and expense might have been avoided by the taking of that "first trouble."

"First trouble is least trouble." Over and over one sees it proved, perhaps never more pitifully than when the nervous, broken wife and mother wanders into the office with the same old story: "I was such a strong, healthy girl; never knew what it was to be in pain. It is queer, isn't it, but I've never been well since my first baby was born. . . ." And usually she remarks that she has "lost" the last one or two.

Ah, "first trouble is least trouble!" And then one travels back over the road marked by pain and failure with her to find out just where that first trouble should have been taken. Sometimes we tell her, sometimes we do not—only add another item to the long, sad list that we keep in our private records of life.

So when the baby has finally arrived, and the doctor has gone away, and there is a cessation of excitement, there are a score of "first trouble" things that it is well to know, but better far to do and keep on doing.

LET us think first of the mother. She must be kept quiet. Visitors should be prohibited. Household and other worries likewise removed, and in relieving her of the former it is not necessary to get the affairs of the house into such shape that she will be reduced to despair when she finally is able to take hold again.

Many are the stories of needless destruction that women have told me, the first being when my own mother pointed out to me spoiled spots in a beautiful carpet, remarking with a half-comical look of reminiscence, "That happened when you were born." Just what connection I had with the matter I could not for the life of me see, but I realized even then that strange things might happen at such times. Another little mother whom I accompanied from the hospital had to literally wade through the rooms of her bungalow, because her husband and brother had been "keeping house" in her absence, and had thrown paper, rags, rubbish of all descriptions just anywhere. Her milk lessened to such an extent, by her endeavors to "clear up," that she had to bottle feed the baby, and nearly lost it. But the last case, and one of the most provoking, to put it mildly, was where an "experienced" nurse had "charge." She cared for the mother and babe to some extent, but so ill-fed and neglected the three-year-old boy, who was one of the Journal's finest prize babies, that on his mother getting her hand in again the child was taken seriously ill of some digestive disorder, and she nearly lost him. Although I was not the doctor in charge, yet we feel personally affronted in thus seeing our good work wantonly spoiled.

THE diet while the mother is in bed should be light. Meat should be avoided, also fried food. Fish and chicken may be used. Fruit is best cooked. Use as little fluid as she can manage with for the first three days, so that the milk may not come in too quickly and cause pain, and possibly fever. After the flow of milk becomes established, extra milk, gruel, cocoa, etc., should be drunk between meals and at bedtime to keep up the supply.

It is well about the second or third day to use a breast binder, in shape much like a straight corset cover, sloped out for the arms and pinned snugly over the shoulders and down the front. It should be made of double cotton goods. A piece of cotton batting should be laid between the breasts to prevent chafing. The idea of this bandage is to act as a support while the patient is in a recumbent position. If the bandage is worn till the patient gets about, much trouble may be avoided.

Both the abdominal binder (unless the doctor is coming next day, or has given definite orders concerning it) and the breast bandage should be loosened each day, and the skin beneath bathed and dried and rubbed, after which the bandages can be readjusted.

Too much care in regard to cleanliness cannot be taken. An odor about a sickroom is unpardonable, as well as being unhealthy. Any odd symptom should at once be reported to the doctor. This is one of the "first troubles" that is very important.

Only mild cathartics should be used, and these with the doctor's directions. The simpler ones are rhubarb compound, licorice powder, phosphate of soda, olive oil, medicinal petroleum, etc.

Just here let me call attention again to my oft-repeated remarks anent CASTOR OIL. I am spelling it with capitals. Perhaps it should be put in black type!

Castor oil is, after the first dose, constipating. It is a harsh purgative. Its uses are to rapidly clear the digestive tract of some poisonous or foreign substance and to remove undigested food in cases of acute indigestion. It also makes an excellent astringent dressing for certain inflammatory conditions, e.g., "sore nipples" and chilblains.

The abuses of castor oil are too many to enumerate. Among the most serious is its indiscriminate use during pregnancy and after confinement, and for the so-called constipation of infants and little children. Therefore we may deduce that castor oil is not a cathartic for routine treatment for either mother or babe.

THE experience of many careful obstetricians is that nearly every mother is greatly benefited by a good iron tonic, to be begun before she gets out of bed. Your doctor will give you this, or if a doctor is not to be had, nearly any good iron mixture or Bland's pills will answer, providing it contains a laxative, and does not contain strychnia. If a woman takes strychnia while nursing, the babe may be seriously affected.

The mother should remain in bed for nine or ten days. She should not do much work for four weeks, and no hard work for at least six weeks. At the end of six weeks she should make a great effort to have her doctor thoroughly examine her to see if all is normal again.

This is another of the important "first trouble" places. It is just here that thousands of women "get on the rocks," and later spend years of semi-invalidism, when a few moments' examination and a short course of treatment or care might have made everything as secure as it was before confinement.

The nursing woman should get her rest at night, and also have a rest in the middle of the day. She should have regular outdoor exercise of a pleasant nature. This will induce a good flow of milk more than any other one thing. It is much easier to keep the milk than to bring it back if it once begins to go. Another case of "first trouble." Also it is much easier and safer to feed a baby by the breast than by a bottle.

When a woman is nursing, not only should she endeavor to be happy and light-hearted herself, but her husband and every member of the household should uphold and assist her in this endeavor.

The babe should never be given the breast when the mother is under any great emotional excitement, joy, pain, fear, or anger—especially the last two mentioned. The milk may become poisonous in such cases. Babies have been made very ill, or have taken convulsions and died, after being fed after such excitement.

Heavy work should not be done while nursing. And because there are many different standards of "heavy work," I will make myself a little clearer. Work to be avoided or done slowly or in sections is such as would require long standing, as hours of washing or ironing; long sitting, as sewing; heavy lifting, e.g., housecleaning; anything, in short, that induces great fatigue or exhaustion to the point of interfering with sleeping or eating, or resting; anything, also, that interferes with clock-like regularity in nursing and resting of both mother and babe.

On the other hand, laziness, lounging around indoors, too much indoor occupation, though perhaps not as detrimental to the mother, yet will make much trouble for the babe, will cause the milk to have too much fat, and this, in turn, will cause digestive upset and colic in the babe.

It is my intention to give a few suggestions as to "first trouble" matters in regard to babies next month.

Two happy little brothers whose mother avoided first troubles. In the picture they have just wakened from a sound sleep out-of-doors.

We Want Your Baby in Our Better Canadian Baby Contest

CANADIAN mothers may be divided into two great classes—those who are interested in the tremendous child welfare movement which is sweeping over our Dominion, and those who are still dormant, contented with old conditions, the past high infant death rate and easiest-way-will-do methods.

We do not for a moment think many of our readers belong to this latter group, but our Better Canadian Baby Contest will give those who belong to the group of progressive, thoughtful, wide-awake mothers an opportunity to show their colors and take a decisive step in the important reform for the more intelligent care of Canada's precious babies.

Every baby entered in the contest says as plainly as can be: "My mother believes in child welfare, and wants to know how I compare with other Canadian babies. She wishes to know if I am perfectly developed or if I have some defect which will be discovered when I am examined, and then my doctor can correct it now when I am little. My mother wants me to be one of Canada's very best babies."

This little fairy is Helen Cameron, of Truro, N.S., one of the first babies entered in the contest.

The plan is so very simple. You write to our Better Canadian Babies Bureau for Entry Form. We send you not only this, but a little book, "Wonder-Working Days and the General Care of the Baby," and two Score Cards. Next, you take your baby to your doctor, who examines, weighs and measures the little one according to the directions on the Score Card. He then fills in the card or cards, for if the doctor is busy the mother may fill in the second card herself—it is for her own reference and she keeps it.

After this is done, send us back the Entry Form, one Score Card, and a photo of the baby. This is all, and the child is entered in the contest.

The examination of the Score Cards and photos at the termination of the contest is done by doctors, so the contest is scientific in every way, and the final decisions are founded absolutely on the perfection of the development of the babies.

Send to-day for this literature, which is forwarded quite free of charge. Address the Better Canadian Babies Bureau, Canadian Home Journal, 71 Richmond Street West, Toronto, Ontario.

girls were in a flutter. I think that during the time that followed, the comings and goings of Owen Greave was the most important thing in life to them both.

Meanwhile the big boy, Owen Greave, remained as unruffled as a pan of milk. He called now on one girl and now on the other. It was evidently a matter of honor for whichever girl he called upon to telephone for her friend. Often Osborn went with him and Berenice joined them, so while Osborn and Berenice walked together, Owen walked with Marion and Edith. Maria watched this little comedy with steadily growing disapproval.

"I should think you would do something," she told me. "There's going to be a fine scene one of these days."

"Why, what's the matter?" said I. "What's the matter?" said Maria. "I should think, if you have eyes in your head, you could see that Edith is getting just as sentimental as she can be about Owen Greave; and so is Marion. Edith is far too young to be thinking about boys the way she is. I believe in young people having a good time."

"Why, Maria," I interrupted, "I thought you were pleased at Edith's changed attitude."

"I like to see young girls show a becoming interest in young men," said Maria. "The way young girls patronize them these days is offensive. But when a girl barely turned sixteen looks at a young fellow who has never thought of her twice except as a friend—as if she were a love-sick kitten—I think steps should be taken. But you, Edith, were always as blind as a bat. Now I've been able to see what was happening to Edith, and regretting it, for a long time. Well, one good thing is, she is so young she'll get over it right away."

I should like to know what steps one could take. Alas! a sixteen-year-old girl can fall in love as thoroughly as one of twenty-six; she can go through all the comedy of hopes and fears and of hope deferred, and no one on earth can protect her from it. It is useless for her aunt to object because she looks at her beloved like a sick kitten, and to urge that something be done. And even if you know that the flurry of sentiment is to pass, and leave little trace behind it for lack of fuel on which to feed, you know that your girl is at sea in a new circle of emotions, and you can't help her. You can't tell her anything, and you must pretend, unless she comes to you, that you don't know what is passing in her mind, because, very likely, she doesn't know herself.

Older people do not take seriously enough the trials of their young girls, nor the troubles of their young sons. We treat all their emotions from the point of view that they will soon get over them. Our boys' love-affairs we call calf-love; our girls' first affairs we call sentimentality. Because they can't think of marriage since they are so young, we look upon these boy and girl affairs as of no account at all and yet I don't believe that human beings have changed so much from the time when fourteen-year-old Juliet was a woman. Because of our conditions in this country, we treat them as children, and their emotions as children's emotions, and yet this is not so; their emotions are the emotions of grown-up men and women, and they are as capable of suffering. I do not think we should forget that these emotions of theirs are forming their characters for good or ill more than almost anything that may happen to them later. I don't know whether the tragedy doesn't lie in the very comedy of the whole affair. The very springtime of our emotions, the first flower of the spirit, in our modern life, is generally ridiculed, and almost inevitably destined to be stamped out.

I don't think that Edith realized what was happening to her. The thing she did realize was what was happening to the spirit of her friend. I saw a look of anxiety cross her face when the three of them were together, and I also saw the look of anxiety returned by Marion. Each was mentally asking the other: "Do you really like Owen?" and each was asking herself "What shall I do?"

What was passing in Edith's mind she betrayed one day when we were discussing at dinner the case that had appeared in the paper of a woman who had eloped with her best friend's husband.

"Oh," cried Edith, "I can't imagine anything worse, anything more awful in the world! Think what it must be to deal such a blow to a woman who loves and trusts you!"

"Pooh!" said Jimmie. "Girls are always trying to swipe other girls' beaux; that's what they live for."

"They don't, Jimmie Preston!" cried Edith hotly. "Not nice girls." And I saw her whole body tremble.

"Well, I notice you were mad as a hornet when Belle Mather came up to you and got herself introduced to Owen. Any one could tell you were both hopping!"

"I didn't mind introducing her to Owen, and you know it!" flashed Edith. "I minded any one of my own sex planting herself in other people's way just to get an introduction. If she had asked me to introduce him, I would have fixed it if I could."

"Oh, yes, you would!" said Jimmie.

"Any nice girl," said Edith, going back to the subject at hand, "would suffer horribly at having the least part of the affection that belonged to another woman, and especially if it were her friend."

"Well," said Osborn brutally, "you don't need to worry, Ede."

CHAPTER LVIII.

I WAS in the kitchen one morning soon after this ordering the meals for the day when the Doble's cart drew up to the door and delivered groceries. Seraphy watched the boy until he mounted his cart again, then she jerked her thumb backward over her shoulder.

"Tain't no affair of mine," she announced, "but keep your eye peeled, Mis' Preston—just keep your eye peeled."

"What are you talking about, Seraphy?" I asked. "I thought Doble was perfectly satisfactory."

"I ain't talkin' about groceries," said she, "nor ole Doble; there's more Doble's than one, and I guess I wasn't born yesterday, and I know sheep's eyes when I sees 'em. 'Twasn't fur nothin' that I waited on Edith and Osborn and that there Berenice Doble yesterday afternoon and made 'em chocolate, and the second girl in the house all the time! I seen her asking Osborn's opinion about dogs and her raised in a kennel. I know what that means! And what have so many young ladies come runnin' to the house fur anyway, these days, Mis' Preston? Seems to me, Edith's gettin' a lot of young lady friends, all of a sudden! Seems to me there's lots of young ladies bein' more interested in your flower garden, Mis' Preston, than they used to be!"

And, indeed, I have had lately this experience that I suppose happens to all mothers who have good-looking sons; there comes a time when suddenly you find yourself sought after by various young ladies who have hitherto ignored your existence. They come to call; they ask your opinion about books; they interest themselves in your little hobbies with an artlessness that is rather touching.

I am not enough of a fool to imagine that every girl who looks at my boy falls in love with him, but I do know that a boy who can ask girls to dances and ball games is, of course, run after, and it is much to Osborn's credit that he has never noticed it. But I have and I didn't need Seraphy to point it out to me.

That afternoon Maria and I were sitting in the back library when the telephone bell rang, and Maria, who was expecting to hear from a friend of hers, answered it. I heard her say:

"Yes—oh, yes, Berenice, I'll tell him about it. It's too bad you should have bothered. Oh, it's very nice of you to take it that way, but I know exactly. Oh, you needn't tell me. I know how your mother feels to have a muddy dog come tracking through her nice, clean house."

"That was Berenice Doble," said Maria. "Osborn's horrid dog has run away and come right to her house."

"Oh, he ran away, did he?" said I.

"It's odd he should have gone right to Berenice's house," said Maria.

"Very odd," said I dryly.

"Well, she wants Osborn to come and get him."

"And that's odd, too," said I.

"I don't think it's odd at all," replied Maria. "I should think they'd all want that dog removed as soon as possible. It's always been a great trial to me that we couldn't keep Piker at home. It's just like hens or anything else—if you have them, keep them to yourself. And, you know, Editha, Piker's never held anybody's flower garden sacred. I suppose there isn't a flower garden for miles around that Piker hasn't buried our bones in; and you know, Editha, that it's exactly as if the wrath of God had passed over when Piker has gone through a flower bed. And now this dog is beginning the same business over again. It's very mortifying."

It didn't mortify me. I may be unjust, but I would be willing to wager that the setter pup never ran away at all; or, at least, never ran to Berenice's house.

"Berenice Doble is a very nice, refined girl," Maria went on. "She's so feminine. I think she's a very good companion for Edith; and she's so pleasant and respectful to older people. I think she does Mrs. Doble's upbringing great credit."

"Pooh!" said I, "Maria, she isn't any more feminine than any other girl. She's a great, big, wholesome, strapping, twenty-six-inch waist, five-foot-eight girl."

"She has sweet, pretty, feminine ways; I don't care what the size of her waist is. It isn't the size of people's waists that decides how feminine they are, Editha. Neither your waist nor mine measures the same as when we were girls, and I hope we are no less feminine than we were then."

The next morning Seraphy appeared to me.

"I wish you'd come down and take a peek into my kitchen, Mis' Preston, and see what's settin' under the table. As sure as you're alive, it's the setter pup, large as life and Doble's man that's bringing him. He run away again, and you needn't tell me they don't feed him at Doble's. I know better! I know when a dog's bein' fed and when he ain't bein' fed. Feedin' of him up to her place is what she is, and makin' of him. And Osborn's a starvin' of him and a trainin' of him, and he don't know no more about trainin' a pup than me nor you, Mis' Preston, and he thinks he knows everything, 'cause he can play baseball. I've seen it done all kinds of ways at my time of life," went on Seraphy, "but this beats Ned! I never seen 'em use a setter pup!"

The setter pup's preference for Berenice got to be a standing joke in our family, and during the next month the dog was exchanged between the Doble's and our house and the college almost daily. By the end of this time, if there was any doubt in other people's minds as to whom that dog belonged, there was no doubt in the mind of the dog, for I met him uptown, looking quite sleek and handsome, following Berenice Doble. He had on a fine new collar with a license on it, and it was decorated with a large bow in the colors of Osborn's college. And it was no secret to me that Osborn invited Berenice to go to ball games, and when he went to fetch his dog on its daily excursions to the Doble house, it took him the entire evening to bring it away.

ASPIRATION.

He said, "I will not leave you comfortless"—
And left us Faith to creep into our eyes,
Instead of tears. Yet Death sends mysteries
Which hide the blossom of the wilderness.
Casting us desolate a-down a road
That looms eternal to Eternity.
But God whose pity moves in Charity
On every pilgrim has a gift bestow'd
To help our straining eyes; and in mine own
Gazes my little daughter—trustfully,
O life of Spring! I lean my heart on thee—
Now in the wilderness fresh seeds are sown
Among the rocks of my unhappiness.
Thy faith in me lies in thy clasping hand,
My Faith—in teaching thee to understand.
He said He would not leave us comfortless.

our childhood a pleasure that has never been equalled. It is their birth-right—their privilege to revel in these wondrous stories of imagination, and I have not the least doubt that their mentality is increased and strengthened thereby. I can scarcely imagine a normal childhood apart from Hans Christian Andersen, Grimm's, or the Arabian Nights. What could equal the charm of "The Snow Queen"? What could induce thrills to compete with those called forth by "Ali Baba" or "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp"?

MOST children live in a world of their own creation—a Golden Age which the stern realities of life soon reduce to pitiful grayness. Let them have their dreams, their exaggerated fancies, their own particular little world into which they may retreat when the trials and griefs of childhood press too heavy upon them. We never outgrow our dreams. I have a golden realm in which I wander even now—a kingdom of my own in which I forget that I am a very ordinary person and expand into a personage of tremendous power and importance. Wealth, position, power—all are mine and I defy anything except an attack of softening of the brain or aphasia to take my kingdom from me. When my boys come whooping round the house in Indian attire, or when, in the costume of Long John Silver or some other personage of piratical instincts, they sail the mill-race on a raft made of packing-cases and a Jolly Roger flag torn from my best black silk petticoat, I bless the stars that gave them this insight to another world, an imagination that makes their days interesting and their nights wholesomely drowsy. Keep fairy stories from them! I should think not. I will carefully place in their way every thriller that I can find and rejoice in the fact that they prefer them to some of the decadent and more matter-of-fact literature of to-day which is much less inspiring and not nearly so wholesome. Do you remember the solace that poor little Sara Crewe enjoyed from her imagination? Instead of the household drudge, fallen from her high estate, she was a princess who looked with scorn and pity on those who had the power to torment her body but failed to reach her mind.

ONE prominent educator in the States is quoted as saying that "the fairy story belongs to the age of ignorance and is immoral because it is based on lies, leads to laziness and inculcates weakness." A Western paper, in commenting on this person's ideas, says that it knows "some of the old fairy tales and will admit that they are the product of the age of ignorance and based on lies, if the word lies be stretched thin enough to cover the most beautiful creations of fancy." It continues to observe that if we commence to thin out stories of this class there will be no end to the holocaust. "If so, then down with the Iliad and the Odyssey, blot out the story of King Arthur and his round table, let the twilight of the gods be Stygian darkness. Forget Achilles and Hector, Lancelot and Guinevere; banish Jupiter and Venus, Thor and Frija. They are lies; let us have nothing but the truth."

"And while we are about it let us suppress 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' which is an ignorant fairy tale, and 'A Winter's Tale,' wherein a creature part fish and part man serves a magician. They are both lies. The 'Divine Comedy' is also a lie and 'Faust' should be expurgated. There is too much in it about devils and magic."

"Even the Bible, upon Dr. Blake's theory, would seem to need attention, and we are prepared to go with her thus far: If the roses around the palace of the Sleeping Princess must be pulled up, then we demand the extirpation of Jonah's gourd."

Yes, indeed, if we commence this work—this iconoclastic demolition of all that makes childhood rosy and happy—there will be no end to the destruction. It would be like the fanaticism of the early Puritans who destroyed the beautiful paintings and carvings in English churches because they did not approve of such frivolity. And it is we who suffer the loss. Are we going to deprive our children of the very pleasures that we enjoyed? Not I, for one—and here is my youngest hopeful with his copy of "Tom Thumb." I must go. Good-bye!

Literature and Journalism

By KATHERINE HALE

A Page of Special Interest to Young Writers

MANY of us looking back to the year 1917, will recall a book named "Changing Winds," by St. John Ervine, which told us more graphically than perhaps any other novel how the war came to a group of young English writers. Among them was one character, Henry Quinn, a high-strung sensitive young Irishman, who endeared himself to every reader and who, if the truth were known, was largely autobiographical of St. John Ervine himself.

"Changing Winds" showed the happy comradeship of this group of boys, and how they served their apprenticeship in London. The story is full of interest for all writers, and that is why I am recalling it to the readers of this department, as well as to give them a glimpse of a writer who is more than a writer—a gallant soldier who will go lame all his life, as the result of a serious wound in one of the worst engagements of the latter part of 1917.

Ervine, who is in the early thirties, has just concluded a successful lecture tour in America. He made two Canadian appearances,—one in Montreal and the other in Toronto. In the latter place he spoke on "Impressions of my Elders"; men like Wells, Yeats, Bernard Shaw and others who are influencing modes and methods of story and playwriting to-day.

The writer of this page spent most of a happy day with Mr. Ervine, and what is related here as to his views and advice came from conversations, as well as from the brilliant lecture that he gave for the Women's Canadian Club.

He spoke much of his childhood in Belfast, where Protestants were supposed to be vastly superior to Catholics, and where a small boy once asking his teacher, "Did God make Catholics?" and receiving the reply that He certainly did, exclaimed, "Oh, well, He'll rue it yet!"

But this is difficult advice since so few of us acknowledge nowadays that we have any superiors. And again, these people might refuse to live with their inferiors. So really the only way to follow Yeats' advice is constantly to read the books of the great. "Read great writers as much as possible," says Mr. Ervine. "Read Shakespeare and Shelley and Milton and the Bible, and after that read the authors to whom you naturally gravitate."

As youth naturally delights in sadness, many young people will care to read the Russian novelists, especially Dostoleffsky who is literally steeped in melancholy. Lady Gregory told Mr. Ervine that it was because she was an old woman that she wrote comedies. "Old people can laugh, while youth mourns," she said.

Then in discussing the annual prize for literature, which will be open annually, through the Women's Canadian Club of Toronto, to all unprofessional writers in that city, Mr. Ervine said, that the greatest thing, the greatest encouragement, that a young writer could receive from the community, is not the monetary value of the prize, but it is the fact that he has been given a hearing; a chance, through the selection of the Committee, to rise out of that obscurity which seems so hopeless and so huge. And if not so fortunate as to be the winning competitor, he or she is at least given a chance to present manuscript to those who are really competent to judge work and to give an opinion. "A helping hand, a little kindly recognition, that will be the salvation of your rising genius," said this successful novelist, who has himself waded through the slough of despair, like every other writer who assails the editors and has his manuscripts returned with just about as much promptness as they are sent out.

After all in a literary career, one of the great differences between the Success and the Failure is, that the former never becomes so completely discouraged as to abandon his purpose.

A CORRESPONDENT from Vancouver sends a little story which might be very good, were the angle from which the plot is seen, a little different. Now, the angle from which the plot is seen, is very important. You have "seen" your theme from an angle which seems to be purely physical. There is nothing unlovely about the purely physical, but like the purely spiritual it must be dealt with sincerely and with the full knowledge that the mere attempt is one of the most difficult things in fiction. Without intending to be so you nevertheless present something crude and revolting. There is no touch of beauty or magic about it. Here is a place to put into practice Mr. Ervine's advice and to seriously consider the material at hand. Living in Vancouver, what wonderful material for sea stories, stories of ships and sailors and the stirring adventures of boys! Look away from unhealthy themes to fine and strong ones. Your story shows that you can do better than you think. But improve your diction. Write in every day language, and avoid slang on the one hand and stilted phrases on the other. To use trite expressions is to weary the reader.

I have been asked the rather odd question, "What is the best method of managing conversation in my stories? The characters simply won't talk as if they were real." Well, to make your characters life-like, you must actually live their imagined life in your thought, and then turn the thought into the language of the age and circumstance of the individual portrayed. In an essay or article, a writer may put his or her thoughts into his own language. In a story, a writer is merely the vehicle for his characters' thoughts and actions. Very little of the author himself should intrude. Gradually as you work, something of an individual style in presenting characters will arrive, but in the first stages of story writing the main thing is to understand your characters. Of style in writing it has

THE thing that has remained with me as the very best advice that could be given to those practically interested in literature, occurred in the suggestion, "There is always and under all circumstances material at hand for the man or woman who has it in him to write. Do not seek far fields, develop that which is at hand and may be studied from the life. Surely there is better stuff here in Toronto than there was for Arnold Bennett in the Five Towns. I know—because I have been in the Five Towns."

"At the age of twenty," said Mr. Ervine, "I was in bitter revolt against almost everything; which was quite the right and proper state of mind for a young man who intended to write. If a very young man is not in revolt at everything, he is no good. But by the age of thirty, he should begin to get some sort of perspective, and if at forty he still believes that all established laws which he has to confront are out of order, he is merely pathetic. When I first went to London, I was rather disappointed. I had always expected that something wonderfully exciting would happen to me the moment that I reached there. In other words, I looked for romance. But not even in such a promising place as Hanging Sword Alley did I find it. I began to think that there was a curse on me and that I never would. No lovely lady fled to me for succor, and though other people had things happen that make the most wonderful plots for stories, nothing came to me—nothing except the greatest discovery of all, that if you do not find adventures in life you must just make them up. So you see, a writer is really a disappointed man. If young writers would remember that it would help them a lot."

Mr. Ervine's first advice to these same young writers is something like this—don't be afraid to love and perhaps even to imitate the great authors. Copy them if you like, until you can hardly tell which is which. Then stop short and develop a different quality or you will not be influenced, you will be overpowered.

YEATS once told Mr. Ervine that he had found that an excellent idea is always to live with your superiors.

Chicken a la Marengo.

For Chicken Baltimore.

Chickens As They Might Be Cooked

By MARION HARRIS NEIL
AUTHOR OF "THE THRIFT COOK BOOK."

ALL poultry when young should have smooth and pliable legs, with the scales overlapping very slightly. The spur on the leg of the male bird must be short and not prominent, and the feet should be soft and rather moist. The flesh should be smooth and without long hairs. When choosing a bird that has not been plucked, one should see that the plumage is soft and downy with soft young feathers under the wing and on the breast. If freshly killed, the eyes will be clear and not sunken, and there will be no discoloration of the flesh.

The comb of a fowl should be smooth and of a bright red color. A fowl for roasting, broiling or frying should be young and tender, but for boiling, braising or stewing, an older one may be taken, as the long, slow cooking makes them tender.

Fowls are in season during the greater part of the year, and next to beef and mutton, are the most important of the meat diet, lacking, however, the stimulating qualities of the red meats.

With the exception of ducks and geese, which are rich in fat, poultry will agree with many people who cannot eat other meat. This is particularly true of the breast meat, but the other parts are also good.

Chicken, a fowl under nine months old, is rather more easily digested than other poultry. Broilers are spring chickens about four or five months old. Capons are raised for food only, and are always tender and well flavored. In selecting a chicken, the flesh should be firm, the skin smooth, the feet and legs soft and free from scales, and the cartilage at the end of the breast bone soft.

Chicken à La Marengo.—Cut two or three chickens into neat joints, removing as much of the skin as possible. Melt four tablespoonfuls of oil and one tablespoonful of butter in a saucepan, in which place the pieces of fowl, and season with salt and pepper. Color the pieces slightly, sprinkling them with one tablespoonful of flour and two chopped onions. Then add one-fourth cupful of tomato purée, one bunch of pot herbs and sufficient water to cover. Cover the saucepan and cook gently for two hours. Arrange the joints neatly on a hot dish, remove all grease from the sauce, add to it a squeeze of lemon juice, a pinch of red pepper, more seasoning if necessary, and strain it over. Garnish with croûtons of toasted bread and serve hot.

Chicken Baltimore.—Cut one chicken in neat pieces for serving, sprinkle with salt, pepper and paprika. Dip in beaten egg, toss in fine bread crumbs and arrange in a greased baking dish. Cook in a hot oven for forty minutes, basting with melted drippings. Pile on a hot platter, garnish with thin slices of crisp bacon and sprigs of parsley. Serve with hot white sauce.

Chicken Pie.—Cover chicken, cut in pieces for serving, with boiling water, add one blade of mace, one bay leaf, two sprigs of parsley, tied in a muslin bag. Simmer gently until tender. Thirty minutes before the chicken is done, add one-half pound of sausages cut in pieces. Arrange on the bottom of a baking or fireproof dish slices of hard-cooked eggs, cover with the chicken and sausages, and continue until the dish is full. Add four cupfuls of sauce made from the liquor in the pan, thickened with two tablespoonfuls of butter and four tablespoonfuls of flour cooked together. Reheat in the oven, garnish with pastry points and serve hot.

Broiled Chicken, Potatoes and Peas.

Boned Chicken in Aspic Jelly.—Singe and draw one large chicken, put it into a kettle of boiling water and cook slowly until quite tender. Lift out and set aside to cool. Cut the meat into neat pieces. Put the skin and the bones into a saucepan with four cupfuls of the liquor in which the chicken was cooked, one onion cut into small pieces, one blade of mace, two bay leaves, one teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of whole white peppers and one-fourth teaspoonful of celery seeds, and simmer until reduced to two cupfuls, then add one and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatine; allow the gelatine to dissolve and strain. Arrange a layer of chicken in a wet mold, then a few slices of hard cooked eggs, then sprinkle over two tablespoonfuls of chopped parsley, then more chicken, and so on until the mold is nearly full. Fill the mold with the aspic or stock and place in the refrigerator. Turn out when set, garnish with chopped cooked whites of eggs and parsley. Serve with mayonnaise or boiled dressing.

Pressed Chicken.—Pressed chicken makes a delicious supper dish and is an admirable device for masking a fowl's age. Singe and draw a chicken, but do not cut it up. Boil until tender, in just enough water to keep it cooking. When it is almost ready to fall to pieces, take from the pot and slip out all the bones. Chop or cut the meat very fine, season with salt, pepper, paprika and melted butter, add the liquor in which the chicken was boiled, which should be now reduced to one-half the quantity, and one cupful of softened bread crumbs, i.e., bread crumbs which have been soaked in hot water and then squeezed dry. Heat all together, press into a square mold and serve cold with a garnish of aspic jelly and parsley.

Creole Stewed Chicken.—Singe and draw a good sized fowl and disjoint it carefully. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add three onions sliced thin, and stir until the onions are thoroughly cooked, but do not allow them to burn or even brown deeply. Add the chicken with the dark meat on the bottom and the white meat on the top, add a dash of celery salt and just enough of the juice from a can of tomatoes to cover the chicken. If the chicken is large, this will take an entire quart can of tomatoes pressed through a sieve. Bring to the boiling point, and then push back on the stove to simmer for one hour. Season with one teaspoonful of salt and a mere dash of pepper. Add one sweet red pepper, with the seeds removed and the shell chopped finely, one can of corn and heat thoroughly. Edge a hot platter with boiled rice, lay the chicken neatly inside of this border and pour over it the tomato and corn sauce.

Broiled Chicken.—Broiled chicken is often so cooked that when ready for the table it is stringy and dry. The following method insures a dish that is full of flavor and quality. The chickens must be young and should weigh from one to two pounds each. Split and flatten them with a cleaver, then place in a greased baking pan, skin down, dust lightly with salt and pepper, dot generously with pieces of butter, and put three tablespoonfuls of water in the pan for each chicken; let steam for thirty minutes, basting every ten minutes; then remove from the oven, place the chickens on a gridiron and broil until nicely browned on both sides. To the liquor in the pan add lemon juice and chopped parsley to taste. Arrange the chickens on a hot platter, pour the sauce over and serve immediately. Garnish with mashed potatoes, cooked peas and parsley.

Chicken with Rice and Tomatoes.—Draw a good sized chicken and disjoint it. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan and add one onion sliced very thin. When the onion is cooked, add the chicken and allow it to cook for a moment without browning, shaking the pan gently to keep it from sticking. Cover with boiling water and after it has come to boiling point, push the pan to the back of the stove to simmer the contents for three-fourths of an hour or more if the chicken is large. Have ready, one cupful of rice which has been washed and soaked in cold water. Drain the rice and sprinkle it over the top of the chicken. Season with salt and pepper, put on the cover and cook for thirty minutes, being careful that the rice does not absorb all the water and cause the chicken to scorch. In another saucepan blend two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour over

Grape Juice Recipes

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "THE THRIFT COOK BOOK."

Some New Dishes to Tempt the Indifferent Appetite

GRAPE juice is very cooling, refreshing, appetizing and palatable and is always acceptable at any season of the year. It aids digestion and assimilation of other foods—makes easier the task for the body to get full nourishment from all the food consumed. You will be surprised at the many ways grape juice may be used in the making of beverages, puddings, sauces, cakes, etc.

Grape Juice with Lemon Ice.—Serve grape juice very cold with a spoonful of lemon ice on the top. To make the lemon ice, put two cupfuls of water into a saucepan, add one cupful of sugar and boil for eight minutes, remove the saucepan from the fire and beat until cold. Add the stiffly beaten whites of four eggs, the grated rind of one lemon and the strained juice of three lemons and freeze.

Grape Juice with Eggs.—When you are tired or hungry, try this. Break two fresh eggs into a glass, fill up with grape juice and a small piece of ice. Shake thoroughly, and drink slowly. Serve crackers with this drink.

Grape Juice Salad Dressing.—Whip up one cupful of whipping cream, when stiff, add one-fourth cupful of grape juice, and a few grains of salt. Chill and use with any fruit salad, such as peach salad.

Grape Juice Conserve.—Slice thinly twelve oranges, add the grated rinds and strained juice of four lemons, six pounds of seedless raisins, and three pounds of mixed nut meats, blanched and chopped. Dissolve seven pounds of sugar in two pints of grape juice, add the orange mixture and cook very slowly until reduced to a thick marmalade. Pack in sterilized jars.

Grape Juice with Baked Apples.—Pare and core apples and place in greased baking tin. Fill the core space of each with grated maple sugar, one-half cupful of grape juice, dot with butter and sprinkle over each a little powdered ginger. Bake until the apples are tender, but not broken, basting with the syrup which forms. Serve hot or cold, with the following grape juice cream: Beat one cupful of whipping cream until stiff, then whip into it one-third cupful of grape juice and sugar to sweeten.

Grape Juice Pie.—Beat one egg and one-half cupful of grated maple sugar together until light. Mix one cupful of grape juice with two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch and then allow it to cook over hot water for four minutes, stirring all the time. Remove from the fire and when cool, add the sugar mixture, one teaspoonful of orange extract and a pinch of salt. Pour into a pie plate lined with pastry and bake in a moderate oven. Cover with meringue and brown lightly in the oven. Serve hot.

Grape Juice Pudding; Sauce.—Bring to boiling point one-half tablespoonful of orange juice and one cupful of grape juice. Moisten one tablespoonful of cornstarch in a little cold water, add to the boiling mixture and stir, and cook for five minutes longer. Then add one cupful of sugar and stir until the sugar is dissolved. Serve hot or cold with sweet puddings, rice pudding, cottage pudding, etc.

Grape Juice Lemonade.—Make two quarts of sweet lemonade, then add two cupfuls of grape juice. Serve very cold in glasses.

For plain grape juice, keep the grape juice on ice and serve very cold, or cracked ice may be added at serving time. If liked diluted, the ice will melt sufficiently, or add plain cold water.

Grape Juice Marshmallow Dainty.—Put the rinds of six oranges and six lemons into a saucepan, add two cupfuls of boiling water and allow to remain covered for thirty minutes.

Strain the juice of the oranges and lemons into a bowl (there should be two cupfuls), add the water drained from the rinds and allow to cool. Then add two quarts of grape juice, one and one-half quarts of ice water and two pounds of grated maple sugar. Serve in glasses with four pieces of marshmallow in each glass.

Grape Juice Punch.—Put four cupfuls of grape juice into a punch bowl, add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar and four cupfuls of water, then add the strained juice from three oranges and three lemons. Make very cold, add sliced bananas and sliced pineapple. Serve with a piece of ice in the punch bowl.

Grape Juice Glace.—Pour two cupfuls of boiling water over one pound of lump sugar, allow it to dissolve, then add two inches of cinnamon stick and two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice. Boil for fifteen minutes and then allow to cool. Add four cupfuls of grape juice and at serving time, stir in a meringue made of four whites of eggs beaten to a stiff froth with four tablespoonfuls of sugar. Serve in glasses with wafers or cake.

Grape Juice Jelly.—Put four and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatine into a clean saucepan, add three cupfuls of grape juice, rinds and strained juice of three lemons, two cupfuls of water, one cupful of sugar, whites and shells of two eggs. Whisk over the fire until boiling, remove the whisk, allow to boil up, draw the saucepan to the side of the fire and allow the contents to settle. Strain through a hot jelly bag and pour into a wet mold. Turn out when firm and serve with cream or milk.

Grape Juice Blanc Mange.—Bring to boiling point one cupful of water, one and one-half cupfuls of grape juice, one-fourth cupful of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and one teaspoonful of powdered nutmeg, stir in ten tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, mixed with one-half cupful of cold water. Stir over hot water until thick and smooth, then cook, stirring occasionally for forty minutes. Pour into a wet mold or wet individual molds. When cold turn out, and serve with stewed or canned fruit.

Grape Juice Ice Cream.—Bring two cupfuls of cream to boiling point in a double boiler and add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar. When cool, add two more cupfuls of cream and two cupfuls of grape juice. Freeze and serve in dainty glasses.

Grape Juice Mint Cup.—Arrange sprigs of mint in tall serving glasses, fill two-thirds full of cracked ice, then fill with the following mixture: Add to four cupfuls of grape juice, the strained juice of two lemons and sugar to sweeten. Serve with straws.

Another Method—For each portion, allow one-third cupful of grape juice, in which has been soaked, for at least forty minutes, three bruised mint leaves. Strain these out, and add three tablespoonfuls of orange or lemon juice, one tablespoonful of sugar, and ice water to fill up an ordinary-sized glass.

Grape Juice Purée.—Mix three tablespoonfuls of fine sago or tapioca with three cupfuls of water in a saucepan, stir over the fire until it cooks slowly for twenty-five minutes. Then add three cupfuls of grape juice, one-half cupful of sugar and a pinch of powdered nutmeg or cinnamon and boil for five minutes. Chill and set aside to cool. At serving time put a little crushed ice in the bottom of bouillon cups, then fill three-fourths full of the grape juice purée. Serve with crackers or rusks.

Grape Juice Sherbet.—Put two cupfuls of sugar into a saucepan with four cupfuls of water and boil for twenty minutes. Add the strained juice of one lemon and one orange, three cupfuls of grape juice, one tablespoonful of gelatine dissolved in one cupful of boiling water and when cold freeze.

Short Sleeves Being Now in Vogue, a Beautiful Arm is Much to be Desired.

IT is surprising the way in which a change of fashion will necessitate our emphasizing the care given to first one part of our body and then another. For instance, in the days when it was considered the correct style to wear collars which reached well up under our chins and were even supported by celluloid braces so that they might attain the highest point possible under the ear (the higher the smarter!), we were not obliged to be so careful about the texture of the skin underneath, nor was there necessity for spending so much time in rubbing in whitening and lubricating creams to keep it soft and beautiful. However, the moment low necks (long may they remain) came into fashion, the entire feminine world began to take stock of its neck. There was a great demand for neck bleaching creams, and cocoa-butter to fill in the hollow places, and crease eradicators. Only the most careless mortals forgot to add a nightly neck massage to the other features of their beauty culture. Many new preparations came into existence to aid in making the neck beautiful, and most of these have been in use ever since.

For a number of years past long sleeves have been in fashion's favor, but as happens with the swing of the pendulum, short sleeves are now comme il faut, and the arm, especially from slightly above the elbow to the wrist, is once more very much in the public eye. Now it may so happen, and I trust it does, that you possess a pretty and shapely arm, an arm that is roundly moulded and delightfully tapering to the wrist. If this be the case, so much the less for your anxieties. But if your arm is an angular and thin arm, then, dear lady, it behooves you without loss of time to undertake to make it beautiful.

WHETHER naturally pleasing or not, it is reasonable to expect that the unusual exposure to which arms will be subjected by wearing short sleeves will necessitate their receiving unusual care. Take the elbow for instance, it is very easy to develop a spot of hard skin or callus on this point when it is constantly meeting hard and sometimes rough surfaces with nothing to protect it. And some of us, despite the fact that early training taught us otherwise, still have a persistent habit of "leaning on our elbows." It is such a nice, comfortable position, you will say, that you hate to give it up. Another little sacrifice on the altar of beauty, my friend—and each of these, remember, helps to make or strengthen the character!

Then there is the danger of a chapped skin, and that makes the arm red and unbeautiful. I hesitate to recommend any particular preparation for chapped skin, because it has been my experience that what is "meat for one, is poison for another." The old remedy of glycerine and rose water is a perfect cure in some cases but I have known it to do nothing but increase the irritation and add to the soreness in others. I have in mind a liquid that I always keep on my dressing table, it is rose pink in color and has a nice, fragrant smell and what I like best about it besides its healing qualities, is that I can apply it ten minutes before I am ready to put on my gloves and there is never any suggestion of stickiness about it. It keeps the hands and arms smooth and white and because it is successful with my skin, it might be successful with yours.

I spoke about cocoa butter for filling out the hollows about the neck. This has another use, too, in connection with the arms and you will find that a thin and bony arm and wrist is greatly improved by a persistent rubbing in of cocoa-butter. On the other hand, if the arm is too fat to be attractive, there are exercises that will aid in its reduction.

IN the exuberance of your spirits in welcoming the May, don't forget, dear ladies, that this is the season of the year when the hair most needs extra care and attention. It is not going to be denied, either. If you brush the matter lightly aside it will repay you by looking dull and sulky and unkempt. If you neglect it altogether, it refuses to be ignored and makes a nuisance of itself by coming out. You will always notice that the carpet brush and the vacuum sweeper and the bedroom waste-basket contain more stray combs in the spring and the fall of the year than at any other season. If you haven't time for anything else, at least brush your hair more than usual at this time. And with regard to brushing, it is well to point out that, like everything else, there is a right and a wrong way of doing this. The brush, you know, is not intended to take out the tangles, the comb must perform this function. The comb should never be run from the roots of the hair to the end. That method will pull the hair out or break it. Begin at the end of the hair and slowly disentangle the strands as you go along, until the entire head is smooth. At this stage, the brush enters. Brushing the hair is largely for the purpose of putting the scalp in a gentle glow and assisting the natural oils to flow freely. This is the reason we find that well-brushed hair has a gloss and shine that adds greatly to its beauty. A head of hair, too, after being carefully and thoroughly brushed, is almost as free from dust as a floor had been freshly swept. This is the reason why to keep the hair bright and free of dandruff and cleanliness.

CORRESPONDENCE

WINDERMERE.—What is most encouraging to hear is the advice which you received has been helpful, dear girl, Vain Jane is only a paper friend and it would be quite impossible to do as you suggest. And what a heap of questions! If you are on a visit to the city in which our magazine is published, you will be able to procure any of the preparations we have recommended. As to the redness of the skin, a girl with a peaches-and-cream complexion told me recently that she used hot milk as a nightly bath for her face. Why not try this simple and easily acquired liquid. There are many reliable makes of talcum powder both pleasant and safe to use and I do not think the cost is more than the sum you mention. But do not use talcum powder on your face—it really is not meant for that. Talcum is a body powder and there are special face powders which are altogether reliable and have a quality which makes them adhere to the skin of the face. But the best are not inexpensive; nothing that is really good ever is, as no doubt your wise mind has discovered for itself. Certainly I can give you the name of a good hairdresser in Toronto, but I trust you are going to stay in the city long enough to make an appointment with him several days ahead. It will be necessary, you know—that is just how good he is.

E. B.—I can quite appreciate your anxiety, my Western friend, for a very real trouble is at hand when such a condition as you describe has been reached. The preparation of which I have written you, is a troublesome one to use, but I wish you luck and hope that in a short time you may find benefit from its application. What nice things you say about us! They make us anxious to hear from you again when the treatment has had time to take effect. Thank you very much.

The Revival of Folk Dancing

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

A Movement for the Restoration of Vital Old Musical Measures Which is Making Rare Progress

THE month of May is one peculiarly appropriate in which to speak of the revival of folk dancing, which has become a marked feature of British educational thought during the past fifteen years, and is also gradually making its way in Canada and the United States. It is part of a general movement to bring back the traditional joyousness of "Merry England" to the masses; and though it was interrupted in some degree by the war, one has only to glance at English illustrated journals in which photographs of such exercises frequently appear, to realize that it is making progress. It has also been taken up by many American educationists, and in several of the Canadian cities there are teachers who have introduced folk dancing to the delight of their pupils. The movement has, moreover, this advantage, that the dances are primarily not an affair of the cities at all, but a birth of the English countryside, dating back to the dim and unrecorded past, and handed down by mouth to mouth tradition. They are not scientific, or associated with courts or "society," but a real expression of natural impulses, and just as capable of transplantation to the rural districts of Canada as to its civic centres. The reason why May is an appropriate month in which to speak of them is that in their origins, many of them are associated with that month, which, in the early days of rural England, was celebrated by festivals signifying the period of ploughing, seeding and growth.

The root of all these simple dances, with their vigorous movements and vital rhythms, is what is known as the "Morris," a generic term covering a great variety of festal dances and of which the original derivation is surmised rather than known. In the remoter parts of rural England, the dances associated with May Day, St. John's Eve and Harvest Home have been called Morris dances for a thousand years or more, and not until within the past quarter of a century, when the movement to revive the national music of England took serious form, was there any serious attempt to inquire into the meaning of the word. At first it was assumed that the word was an ancient corruption signifying "Moorish" or "Morocco,"—many Oriental dances having made their way into Western Europe during the Middle Ages through that country; but etymologists and musical historians now trace the word Morris to a Celtic root, "Mor-uiseil," meaning great and dignified; and the dances themselves to Druidical beginnings. They connect them with the old pagan festival of Beltane (from Bel, the sun-god of the Druids) which was celebrated on May Day. It is supposed that multitudes of devotees preceded by three orders of the priesthood,—priests, bards and prophets,—marched in solemn procession to the top of a high hill to watch the kindling of a fire on May first, by direct agency of the sun. A solemn and mysterious dance around the fire thus kindled appears to have been the origin of the Morris or Mor-uiseil dance. Naturally rejoicing followed, for May Day has always been regarded as symbolical of joy. Though the Druidical religion disappeared, the custom of dancing remained in rural England, taking on quaint peasant forms, but always in some degree associated with ceremonial. The dances around the Maypole, the institution of the Lord of Misrule or Master of Revels, and other customs, have the same ancient origins.

TWENTY-FIVE or thirty years ago British composers in their effort to create a national music and get away from the too-dominating influence of Handel and Mendelssohn (who though great composers were alien in inspiration), commenced to delve into the old dance tunes and folk-songs preserved from time immemorial in the rural districts of the motherland. Public interest in these melodious measures was aroused through the theatre. When Sir Arthur Sullivan composed his romantic opera of Tudor times, "The Yeomen of the Guard," he introduced a typical old English melody and dance for his leading number, "The Merryman and His Mayde." In connection with it the characters used the ancient accompaniment of pipe and tabor (a small drum) or to give them the old names by which they were known to the English peasantry, the "whittle" and "dub." These, before fiddling became general, furnished the music for Morris dancing. Another composer of the school of Sullivan, Edward German, carried the movement farther. When Sir Morris dancers at Bampton-in-the-Bush, Oxon, an old English village where the traditional dances have been preserved for over a thousand years.

Henry Irving produced Shakespeare's "Henry the Eighth" he commissioned German to compose incidental music and for the scene of Cardinal Wolsey's Feast the latter wrote a suite of three dances; Morris dance, Fire dance and Shepherd's dance. Nearly every reader must have heard them, consciously or unconsciously, for they have been played by bands, orchestras, and on record machines ever since. They remain an ideal expression of the spirit of old English folk dances, and are used by schools in connection with their revival. Within recent years the Australian composer and pianist, Percy Grainger, has gone deeply into similar sources of inspiration, not only in England but in Ireland. His "Shepherd's Hey," a typical old Morris dance, has gone all over the world, and must be familiar to thousands through the record machines. Hearing any of the numbers mentioned it is difficult to keep the feet still. One has an instinctive impulse to dance.

THE movement in connection with musical competition has however been less fruitful than the allied effort to revive the old figures and start the democracy dancing as they did in days of yore. Recent years have witnessed remarkable changes in connection therewith. It is not so very long since the public was disposed to regard folk-dancing as an interesting curiosity, a fad of the moment which would presently disappear. Some were inclined to dismiss folk-dances as the caperings of yokels, unsuitable to an age which had produced great scientific dancers like Anna Pavlova and had evolved the fox trot. It was soon discovered that these dances entered deeply into the natural feelings of people who have had no education in modern dancing, and no opportunity to observe the great ballet performers of the theatre. Social workers among countless shop and factory girls of London, discovered that Cockney women could take deep enjoyment and relaxation from the old dances of the countryside in which all could participate. Dancers from small rural villages, illiterate in most matters, but familiar with the old tunes and traditional movements were brought to London to instruct these girls and found willing pupils, many of whom were saved from the streets by the source of natural expression and enjoyment thus opened to them.

THE JOURNAL JUNIORS' CLUB

Conducted By Ethel Bain

MY Dear Club Members:

This month our story writers are going to have scope for their imaginative powers. What would you do or think, if a legal letter was delivered to you and the contents stated that you were heir to fifty thousand dollars? Who was the generous, perhaps unknown person who thought of you? What had you done to deserve such a legacy? Put on your thinking caps and get to work. This subject was suggested by one of our members and I'm sure there is going to be keen competition.

You are now enrolled as a member, Mary Donaldson, and I shall look forward to seeing you enter the story contests. You are very observant in noticing the points you mention, in the stories written for children. I don't know why the majority of such writers do as you say, for there is no set rule as to how such stories should be written. Yes, we have some clever members in the Club. Your using ruled paper would help to keep your writing even.

Thank you for suggestions, Doris Wonnacott, I will remember same. Am glad to say I escaped the influenza and these lovely spring days make one feel glad to be alive, don't they?

I have enrolled you both as members, Gladys M. Pitman and Gould Barton. There is no fee to pay and I hope you will both try to win a prize.

Thank you for your nice letter, Evelyn Grant. Am expecting a lot of new members from Princeton. It is exciting to win a prize and I hope you'll try again.

So glad to hear from you again, Roy W. Graham. Your story was very good but I wanted a real fairy tale. What about the contest for this month? You'll enter it, won't you? I noticed your success in the Toronto "Globe" Circle of Young Canada.

Best wishes to all members from Your Sincere Friend,

ETHEL BAIN.

PRIZE LETTER.

"My Pets" by Helen Edwards, age 10, Pakenham, Ontario.

I HAVE four pets, two cats and two rabbits. We call the cats Mopsy and Gypsy, and the rabbits, Peter and Nell.

The cats are in the house most of the time and are great company.

Gypsy is brown, black and white. One side of her face is black, the other is brown, and so is the top of her head. There are brown and black spots on her tail and the rest of her is white. Mopsy is much like Gypsy, or "Gyp" as we call her, but both sides of her face are black and she is more gray than Gyp. Her head is brown and black. One of her hind feet is black on the bottom and the other brown.

They do many very funny and many naughty things. One very funny thing they do is get into the coal-scuttle and one day Mopsy tipped it and rolled over with it. These two pussies are very lonesome if one of us is sick, and roam around like lost sheep until they find us and then stay nearby and hardly go away long enough to eat.

Peter and Nell are at my father's warehouse all the time and pick up what falls from the bags when the men are loading or unloading their grain. They are both white in the winter but in the summer, Nell turns yellowish-brown. Last summer Nell had eleven little rabbits, five of them died, we gave three away, and three were stolen.

Sometimes we feed the rabbits oats and sometimes turnip or potato-peels, and they thrive. The whole four of my pets are very fat and the pussies never seem to have enough to eat.

PRIZE LETTER.

"My Aim in Life," by E. Crow, age 13, Fergus, Ontario.

MY aim in life is to be a good sport and play the game. Perhaps you think this is rather small, but nevertheless, it stands for a good deal. This is a high aim and it is few who can live up to it every time. If it is true that "The worst failure is the man who doesn't try," surely it is better to have a high aim and strive to live up to it, than to have no aim to make an attempt to live up to.

To make the definition very brief, in comparison with what it really covers, I say that a good sport is polite, unselfish, honest, brave and always gives the other fellow the square deal, in short, a good sport "plays the game."

Our soldiers and nurses "played the game" to the fullest extent during the war, and surely they will look to us to at least make an attempt at what they made such a grand success.

I read in some book that the three most detestable people in the world are the snob, the coward, and the quitter. Most of the people who have other undesirable characteristics, can be classed in one of these three classes, and anyone who is a "sport" is certainly not a snob, a coward or a quitter.

PRIZE POETRY.

"Spring," by Marguerite Murray Cooper, age 16, Box 209, Petrolia, Ontario.

ON the earth to-day the sun shone clear,

And seemed to us all a message to bring,

Which said as we lifted our heads to hear,

'Tis Spring—'Tis Spring.

GRASS RUGS

MADE IN AMERICA

The Ideal Floor Covering

YOUR porch or veranda—the outdoor living room of the whole family from Spring to Fall—can be made as cheerful and comfortable as any room by a judicious selection of CREX rugs in colors to harmonize with your porch furniture, hanging baskets, jardinières, etc.

Sun parlors, too, offer the same opportunity for simple yet artistic treatment. The natural grass blending with soft, neutral color designs in which green, brown and blue predominate produces an effect at once most charming and delightful.

Remember, all grass rugs are not CREX. You may even be offered imitations made of split or crushed straw. But genuine CREX rugs will give to you the same satisfaction they have given to millions of other users during the past twenty years. In homes both modest and pretentious they have stood the test of time.

CREX is easily said and easily read. The name woven in the side binding provides an ineffaceable identification mark.

Handsomely illustrated catalog showing actual colors and sizes of the three CREX weaves—DELUXE, HERRINGBONE and REGULAR—mailed free on request.

Woodwork— spotless—like new!

YOU'LL find that Gold Dust—soapy and cleansing—takes wonderful care of woodwork—a tablespoonful only to half a pail of warm water. See how quickly and thoroughly Gold Dust removes the oily deposit and dirt—almost without rubbing. Woodwork cleaned with “soap rubbed on a cloth” is apt to be smirched. But cleaned with Gold Dust—how new, how fresh, how spotless it looks!

When you see the words Gold Dust on the package you know it really is Gold Dust. Without the real Gold Dust you can't get Gold Dust results.

MY BEST IDEA

CONTRIBUTED BY OUR READERS

In this Department we will publish the best original items of general interest to housekeepers which are sent in by our readers. For each of the accepted items we shall pay the one sending it, fifty cents.

If the description is not clear we would suggest that the contributor send a rough sketch, making the idea plain, which can be used as a guide to the artist who will illustrate this page.

The CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL cannot return the items submitted, therefore it is advisable to keep copies of matter sent for consideration.

Address “My Best Idea,” care of CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Grind Tea Leaves

Did you know that by grinding tea leaves before using them they will go twice as far? And some think the resulting flavor more delicate.

Change Folds in Linen.

When laundering household linen, such as sheets, tablecloths, serviettes, etc., try folding them alternately in three and four, which prevents them cutting through as quickly as when always folded the same way for mangling or ironing. Linen is not as good in quality as it used to be and needs more careful use.

Mrs. W. Jackson, Sooke, B.C.

To Launder a Lace Collar

An old lady in Belgium told me to baste the lace collar I bought of her years ago, on a firm piece of white cloth when laundering it. Put it in a deep saucer filled with soap-suds and leave it in the sun. Do not use starch and your collar will last for years.

Pocket in a Handkerchief.

For safe carrying of a powder puff, take a piece of material and sew a small pocket in one corner of a handkerchief. Into this slip the puff and close with a dome fastener. It will not show when handkerchief is being used and is handy at all times especially when going on short calls where hand bag is left at home. It also prevents the powder from soiling other articles next to it.

E. C. S., Welland, Ont.

Uses For a Wire Basket

A Wire Letter Basket is most useful in the kitchen. Baked potatoes arranged in it can be taken out of the oven, turned and put back with no danger of burning the hands. Turned upside down, it makes a fine rack for cooling bread and cake. It is safer than a waiter in which to carry small pieces of china back and forth between the dining room and the kitchen.

Picture Puzzle for Children.

Take any nicely colored picture that is attractive to children (some of the covers of this journal) paste onto firm cardboard, then cut into small pieces and it gives the children much entertainment to put the picture together again. When using Journal covers—cut out the small reproduction often given in the previous magazine—put it on a small card, and it serves as a guide.

A Reader, Victoria, B.C.

Cleaning Spiral Bedsprings.

Cleaning spiral bedsprings has always been a trial for the housekeeper. It may, however, be easily accomplished if she uses a dish-mop, and keeps one just for that purpose. Get the dust out of the springs first with the dry mop, then dampen the mop and go over the metal a second time.

Peeling off Plasters

Those who have painfully and painstakingly removed plasters will appreciate this tip: Moisten the plaster thoroughly with olive oil and it can then be easily removed.

For Uneven Legs of Tables and Chairs

Tack a piece of cork to the short leg, using small tacks and driving them well into the wood. They will sink way in and so will not scratch the floor and the cork itself will act like a rubber pad, eliminating that disagreeable scraping sound.

A handy way to keep old Newspapers

Take a block of wood—about 4 or 5 inches square and about 1/2 inch thick. Drive a 4 inch nail through the centre. Then fasten the block against the kitchen wall—with the point of the nail projecting. Hang your old newspapers, folded in half, on the nail. You will find this a tidy and convenient way of keeping the papers—ready to wrap garbage—or the one hundred and one uses to which old newspapers can be put.

V. A. R., Toronto.

Stop those Runs

Keep your stockings from getting “runs” by putting a row of machine stitches around each stocking three or four inches from the top.

Thread the Needle Easily.

When threading a machine-needle, is difficult, thread the sewing-machine as usual, then detach needle, hold it to the light, thread and replace.

G. M. R., Forest, Ont.

A Home-made Cart

A Kitchen Cart may be made by fitting wheels to a small kitchen table. All the dishes may be placed in it, after drying, and taken to the china closet in one trip.

Sandpaper Helps to Remove Tops.

To remove obstinate tops on gem jars, place over same a piece of medium rough sand-paper. This will enable you to get such a firm grip on the top that it can be easily removed.

M. S. H., Toronto.

Clean Walls With Sandpaper.

A piece of fine sandpaper rubbed lightly on a white plastered wall, will remove pencil-marks, finger-marks, etc., without smearing the surface.

M. S. H., Toronto.

Round Dish Towels.

A convenient sized and economical dish towel can be made by using one and a half yards of dish towel and sewing the ends together after the fashion of the roller towel. This prevents the towel from wearing in the centre, leaving corners to waste. This towel is easily washed, and not clumsy to use.

Heat Dry Lemons.

When lemons are so dry, they are of little use, place them in the oven until heated through, you will be surprised at the amount of juice they will then give.

Silhouette Ice Cream.

A friend of mine who was in charge of the ice cream counter at a sale, tried an original scheme. She advertised “Silhouette Ice Cream,” and her booth was decidedly popular. At a five-and-ten-cent store she found a Gingerbread Man cookie-cutter and, using only the head of it, she cut tiny heads out of ginger cookies, and silhouetted them on slices of white brick ice cream. This idea would undoubtedly prove popular at a children's party, or at a valentine party, where heart-shaped silhouettes could be used on pink or white ice cream.

New Filet Designs for Household Linens

No. 171—Exquisite Luncheon Cloth of Linen and Filet Crochet—54 inches square

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 171, 30 cents. Handsome luncheon cloth, 54 inches square, made of plain white linen and edged with a filet crochet border 4 inches deep. The center medallion measures 14 inches in diameter. Ten balls of No. 80 crochet cotton and a steel crochet hook No. 14 will be required. A one-inch hand hemstitched hem gives a pleasing finish to the cloth. The medallion and edge are whipped onto the linen. To insert a medallion such as illustrated, baste in position, cut away the linen underneath to within 1/2-inch of the medallion, turn this in and sew the medallion securely to the linen.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 173, 15 cents, and The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern No. 11827, blue or yellow, 20 cents, are combined in the decoration of this tea-cloth. It is exceedingly effective used as a centerpiece between meals. Each corner measures 9 by 15 inches. To make the four corners, six balls of No. 70 crochet cotton, and one hook No. 14 will be required. The four rose sprays are worked in raised satin stitch in No. 10 white mercerized cotton. A picot edge finishes the tea-cloth. Enlarged detail of the fancy filet crochet corner is shown below at left of this page.

No. 172—Simple Buffet or Dresser Scarf of White Linen and Filet Crochet

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 172, 15 cents. Pretty dresser or buffet scarf with filet crochet insertion and edging. The insertion is one-inch wide; edging three inches wide. Five balls of No. 50 crochet cotton and a No. 10 hook will be required to make it. The back edge of scarf is hemstitched.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 174, 15 cents. Grape leaf and vine design for an insertion, four inches wide made with No. 50 crochet cotton and hook No. 10. If it is desired wider, No. 10, 15, or 20 cotton must be used with hook No. 9; if narrower use No. 80, 90, or 100 cotton and a fine hook.

No. 11827—Embroidery Motifs
No. 173—Fancy Filet Crochet Corners

No. 174—Filet Crochet Insertion for Towels or Bed Linens

No. 12496—Embroidery Design
No. 156—Filet Crochet Insertion

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 170, 25 cents. This handsome fruit and basket luncheon cloth in Maltese Cross design is 45 inches in diameter. The crochet border at widest part is 11 1/2 inches deep. The center section about 2 1/2 inches in diameter.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 156, 15 cents. A very pretty filet crochet insertion is illustrated in this design for scarfs, towels, or sheets.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12496, blue or yellow, 15 cents, supplies three yards of embroidery motifs 2 1/4 by 3 3/8 inches, suitable for household linens.

Handsome Luncheon Cloth in Filet Crochet—45 inches in diameter

No. 171—One-half of Luncheon Napkin. This matches cloth shown at top of page

And my happy heart as it beat to-day, Along with the rest of the world, seemed to sing.

This sweet little song, so joyous and gay.

'Tis Spring—'Tis Spring.

FLICKER, THE ARTISAN.

By ETHEL BAIN

FROM the woods came a persistent hammering. The forester filling his pail at the sparkling spring, paused and straightened himself up to listen for a moment. The hammering continued. "It's the carpenter," he said to himself as he stooped to lift the overflowing pail, then tramping down to the cabin, placed it safely inside and came out into the open air. Taking a deep breath, he listened again to the hammering which sounded nearer. "Must go and see him," he murmured. "Can't help it," he went on, "this spring weather gets into my whole being." So off he went across the clearing, then turned into the woodland path. Noiselessly he walked, for many years spent in the forests had taught him that Nature's children did not like noisy movements, for the latter generally spelled disaster, and the wild folk scuttled out of sight at noises made by mankind. Instinctively they always knew when the noises were not made by their own relatives, and so the forester had learned slowly but wisely the ways of the woods, until the birds and four-footed creatures had learned, in their turn, to love and not to fear the two-legged giant who constantly crossed their paths and provided them with food when their own stores were scanty.

On he walked until the hammering sounded but a few feet away. Then, standing still, his keen eyes glanced rapidly through the feathery-leaved branches. At last he saw what he was searching for. "Good morning, Mr. Flicker," he said gently. The bird continued his hammering. "It's good to see you again," the forester went on, "but haven't you a mate?"

The woodpecker paused at the continued sound of the voice, but on seeing no movement on the part of the man, seemed reassured and looked at him with his black beadlike eyes for a moment, then went back to his hammering.

"You're a real artisan, Flicker," the forester continued in a low tone. "Just a plain, hard-working citizen of Nature's realm. No airs or graces about you, friend, and evidently you hammer a hole in any tree that appears to need a hole, or, that is, you think it needs one. There's that Californian cousin of yours—how he fills the holes up with acorns. Of course, I know that is his peculiar way of storing his supplies, but there it is; well, you are all different, and I believe you eat more ants than acorns."

The flicker, tired of hammering, spread his wings and flew away, with his strong, laughing call ringing through the air. The forester watched him as he disappeared from sight, then wandered slowly along, stopping to admire the dainty catkins or a newly awakened insect making its way up the trunk of a tree, to the insect a journey full of adventure and danger. He whistled replies to the birds as they called in the trees, and startled another flicker from an ant hill, where it was busy getting a meal by thrusting its head into the mound and drawing it out again with its sticky and extensible tongue covered with ants. Perhaps the insects were grateful to the man who watched them running in all directions from their wrecked home, but the woodpecker would have preferred not to have been disturbed, and eyed the intruder anxiously from a nearby tree.

"Sorry I broke in, friend," the woodsman exclaimed as he looked at the silent bird. A continuous hissing sound like a snake cut the silence. The man looked up into the tree above his head. Five little baby heads were peeping out from a nest hole. Hungry they were, and probably wondering why their parents did not return. Silently the forester retraced his steps and hid behind a tree. Several moments passed before the flicker returned to the ant hill, where he was soon busy getting the remainder of his meal. Again the baby birds crept up to the edge of the hole and hissed. The flicker heard, and flying up, alighted on the tree near to the nest hole. As soon as the babies heard him scratching on the bark out popped the five rather naked heads, each one with its mouth wide open. Flicker, the artisan, hesitated and looked at each of his children. They were all so much alike and all so hungry. Which one did he feed the last time he came home? Evidently he made his choice, for he bent over one of the little birds and put his long bill down its throat.

"Looks as if he would kill the youngster," murmured the forester, as he watched the proceedings. Then, as he waited, he saw the old bird jerk the young one up and down, and suddenly realized that it was pumping the partly digested food from its own stomach into that of the birdling. It was a strange sight as the bird clung securely to the tree with its claws, for the whole body vibrated and wings and tail twitched nervously until the feeding process was over.

"Just like the humming bird and the pigeon," whispered the man. "Wonderful," he went on, "to think of how such small creatures care for their young. Ah, Flicker," he said to himself, as the parent bird released the young one and flew away, "we know too little of your good points. Your devotion to your family is not to be doubted, and the good you do is manifold, for by destroying thousands of ants you do mankind a service. Your habit of feeding on the ground is like that of the meadow lark, and like him, too, you are skilful in devouring that well-known pest, the white grub, which destroys so much grassland and so many field crops. Flicker, there's several nest boxes going to be built for you and yours around here. You'll be welcome as a tenant for life. You'll have no rent to pay, and your children will be welcome, too."

Quietly he slipped away through the woods, and as he retraced his steps he heard many woodpeckers, all artisans, filling the air with harmonious rappings, now here, now there, as their fancy suited them, and making up for lack of song by mixing their hammerings with calls that bubbled over with mirth and good-humored laughter.

ordination—may I warn you against the too-ministerial style? We are not running an altogether ecclesiastical sheet, you know!"

SHE stood her ground. "Sir—I believe in spiritual values. The world is in a fearful turmoil. Materialism is rampant."

Dryfield stared at her. "Good Heavens! Miss Sterling, I feel as if the clock or the typewriter or some other inanimate thing had begun to talk. I haven't had such a jolt for years. Please go home, and I will ponder on these things, as you would say."

Miss Sterling gave him a searching glance, then she went to get her hat and coat.

"Clever!" muttered the surprised man, "but no more humor than a Dutch oven. Wonder if we could instill some? If we could, she would be a dandy writer. Now for the rest of these articles, and then home, and mother!"

At eight o'clock he too put on his hat and coat, and whistling as the clock stared reproachfully at him, telephoned for a taxi, and hurried to his home—an old family mansion, stranded amid its gardens in the heart of a rapidly growing city.

When his mother met him in the big hall, with reproaches for being so late, he stared at her absently, then surprised her by asking abruptly, "Mother, how old am I?"

"Thirty-five, dear," she said plaintively, "and not married yet. Have you seen anyone—?"

"No," he said, "but I was just feeling very young compared with my new editor, who is twenty-five."

"Is he so mature?" asked his mother.

"Preternaturally—a dry, dull dog of a creature—don't think a smile would hang on his countenance if nailed there."

"I'm glad you've found someone to take poor Mr. Maybury's place," said Mrs. Dryfield. "Now do get to the table as quickly as you can. Everything is overdone and cook is in despair."

WHEN a short time later, Dryfield was abstractedly pouring half the contents of a vinegar bottle over some slices of chicken on his plate, his mother exclaimed at him, "For once, Wynne, you've left your mind in your office—and I've boasted so much of your agreeable habit of neither thinking, nor talking shop at home."

"It's that assistant," he muttered.

"I'd like to see him," said his mother curiously. "He must be clever to so obsess you. Would you like to have him to dinner?"

Dryfield suddenly threw back his head and laughed like a boy.

"Why, Wynne!" exclaimed Mrs. Dryfield with fork upraised. "What has come over you? Do bring this queer young man here. I am becoming very curious about him."

"All right, all right," he said, subduing his merriment. "Now tell me about the clubs and the hospital work and all the other things my good little mother has been doing—I promise to put that office behind me."

So successfully did he do so, that his mother forgot all about the new assistant, until a day two weeks later, when Dryfield telephoned that he would bring him home to dinner, if it would be agreeable to her.

Mrs. Dryfield, who prided herself on domestic arrangements, that always permitted her only son and heir to invite a guest at any time, gladly agreed to this proposal, and at seven o'clock was in her pretty reception-room, awaiting the arrival of the strange young man.

When her son came into the room accompanied by a dark, serious-faced, young woman, she looked behind the entering guest, and as she shook hands, said, "Where is your husband?"

"I have none," said the young woman, as calmly as if the question were one that she was quite accustomed to.

"Oh!" said Mrs. Dryfield, "I thought that you were the assistant editor's wife."

"She is the assistant editor," said Dryfield. "I should have told you, mother, that she is not a man. Women are to the fore in everything now, you know. I couldn't get a man to suit me, to tell the truth."

"How interesting!" exclaimed Mrs. Dryfield, but she bestowed a penetrating glance on the stranger.

The girl had no hat on. She had evidently come in a taxi with her son. A light wrap that she threw off had just been taken carefully by him, and put in the hall.

"Why! I have seen you before," said Mrs. Dryfield, as they went into the dining-room. "You are my son's stenographer."

"I was," she said. "My sister is now."

"A family compact," reflected the astute woman of the world. "and is she going to marry my son? He is in love with her. I never saw him look at a woman in that way before—yes or no, yes or no," she thought to herself all through soup, fish, meat, pudding and dessert courses. "What a correct, reserved manner she has. Nothing gushing about her, but one can't always tell about girls, or rather women. She's twenty-five, if she's a day."

"I like your articles, Miss Sterling, but I never dreamed they were written by so young a person, and a woman at that."

"I had wonderful parents," said Elizabeth. "They had broad minds, and I was with them constantly, but I can not write as my father did."

"Do you mind telling me a little about your family?" asked Mrs. Dryfield kindly, when she found herself after dinner sitting on a sofa beside Elizabeth, while Dryfield ranged about the long room, smoking innumerable cigarettes.

"Not at all," said Elizabeth, and she gave her attentive hearer a sketch of a somewhat uneventful life, except for deaths and money troubles.

"You have aged before your time," said the older woman. "Do you enjoy amusement when you can get it?"

"Oh! very much," said the girl with some enthusiasm and a quick flashing of her brown eyes, "much more than girls and women who have always had it."

Dryfield who had paused near them, heard this last remark, and when his mother was presently called to the telephone, he slipped into her place on the sofa.

"Then there is a possibility that you are not always stiff and chilling and reserved," he said teasingly.

"Oh, yes, sir," she said, with an absent look in her eyes. "You have never seen anything but my official self."

"Would you," he said coaxingly, "would you just for the rest of the evening, mind being unofficial and natural. No harm will come of it. My mother and I are perfectly respectable and enjoy excellent reputations."

"With pleasure," she said soberly. "I get very tired myself sometimes, of being stiff—but my parents warned me about over-familiarity in business life."

"Poor girl!" he said quickly. "I should like to give you some pleasure."

"I have it," she said demurely.

"In what way?" he asked sharply.

"One is not bound to tell all the secret sources of one's little joys," she said roguishly.

"I should like to know," he said in a puzzled voice, "what is the thing that gives you most pleasure in life. Is it the devotion of your little sister?"

"No—not that."

"The worship of your hurly-burly of a brother, who is too big a proposition for you to handle alone?"

"No, no—you haven't guessed yet, and you can't."

"I like your unofficial self," he said mischievously. "Please never be official again."

"I have three selves," said Elizabeth seriously, "first my own natural self, with my family, then my office self with the world at large, then my own secret self, known only to my Creator and myself."

"You're in love with some man," said Dryfield irritably, and getting up, he towered over her, "and I shall lose my priceless assistant—you're going to be married."

"Oh, no," she said, but blushing like a rose.

"You are," he insisted, "tell me who it is. Anyone I know?"

"Mr. Dryfield," she said demurely, "will you kindly take my unofficial self home, or allow my official self to take myself home, for it is half past ten, and the correct time for a first night guest to retire from a dinner, if she ever wishes to be asked again."

"Elizabeth," he said intensely, affectionately, and yet with some irritation, "do you know I'm in love with you?"

"Yes sir," she said seriously.

"Now won't you tell me who the man is you're in love with? I am ten years older than you—I have a right to know."

She paused an instant, her eyes roaming about the room. Then, seeing

$10,000<sup>00</sup> In Cash Prizes

$3,000.00 First Prize for a Thought

103 other prizes from $1,000 to $10.00

ANOTHER Eveready contest! Another chance to win a big cash prize! Another incentive for active-minded men, women, boys and girls—for everybody with imagination.

On June 1, Daylo dealers throughout the United States and Canada will display in their windows the new Daylo Contest Picture. It has no title. The story it tells is a great big interesting, intensely human one. A thousand different people will see a thousand different stories in the picture. The story the picture tells you may be the most interesting—the prize winner—the story that may be worth $3000.00 to you.

If your answer doesn't win first it may win the second prize—$1000.00—or one of the 102 other prizes, none less than $10.00.

Go to the store of a Daylo dealer. Study the picture in the window and write, on a contest blank which the dealer will give you, what you think the letter says. Use 12 words or less. For the best answer that conforms to the contest rules, the winner will receive $3000.00 in cash. Answers will be judged by the editors of LIFE. If two or more contestants submit the identical answer selected by the judges for any prize, the full amount of that prize will be paid to each.

Anyone may enter. There is no cost or obligation of any kind. Submit as many answers as you wish. But do not delay. Get an early look at the picture.

Then send in your answers. Contest closes midnight, August 1st.

TO DEALERS: There is still an opportunity to secure display and contest material for this record-breaking event. Write to the following address:

special interest to the Canadian public, not covered by the Associated Press of America, and these messages appear in the Canadian papers in addition to the Associated's cables. This works out as might be expected. Important matters are still covered for Canada by the American agency, since there is little news of consequence and influence which is not of equal interest in New York and Montreal; and the "special" messages amount to hardly more than a gleanings of personalities or an occasional account of Canadian activities in London, with no political aspect. It is a little plum for the Canadian press, but it does not affect the daily public digestion of the diet supplied by the Associated.

The newspapers of Canada are growing in revenue, influence and solidarity, but it stands to reason that they are not in a position to refuse news cabled from London at America's expense on which they are asked to pay little more than the telegraphic charge from New York, nor from a commercial point of view, would the organization of a Canadian agency of equal scope, commend itself on the ground of common sense. The position of the Canadian newspaper proprietor is not enviable in the patriotic aspect. Should he attempt to cover the European situation by special messages, his correspondent is a Don Quixote and his cost is prohibitive. He must have the news or go out of business. He is practically compelled to accept the American agency, and ever so gradually, and unnoticeably undermine and demoralize his readers' faith in the Imperial system of which Canada forms a part.

It is a case of international importance and action is possible only from the standpoint of international interest. Either we value our sentiments toward England and all the common interests of the Imperial connection, or we do not. If we do, this matter of retailing our family news to us, should be taken out of the hands of an outsider. The Canadian and the British Governments together, should bear the burden of a news-distributing Agency which should be Canadian and British, and which should be in a position not only to supply our own press, but to compete with the American Association in the United States. The qualmish editor here and there who scented undue Imperial influence could always neutralize it with the American article in the next column, and in point of accuracy, speed and enterprise, the field would be a competitive one for the whole continent. Otherwise, we may criticize and cavil as we will, in the long run we shall be—as President Wilson, not remotely postulated—of one opinion, and the opinion will be that of the loudest mouth.

his mother approaching, she said under her breath, "My editor-in-chief."

Dryfield turned round with a glowing face. "Mother, you will, I know, excuse me while I take Miss Sterling home."

"Certainly," said Mrs. Dryfield graciously, and as the girl shook hands with her, the experienced and deeply moved woman reflected, "He has proposed and she has accepted, and I would rather have this quaint, little prig than a society butterfly. Thank Heaven, my dear boy is anchored at last, but he will never be the same to his mother again. Alas! we poor mothers," and she sank into a chair and covered her face with her hands.

After a time she sighed heavily and got up. Unfolding a visiting card that she had held curled up in her fingers, she said, "What is her address? She told me she would write it on this card—what! what!" and she brushed a last remaining tear from her eye—"Miss Sterling, 15 Emerald Street. Dear Mrs. Dryfield, I will not take your boy from you—will you be a mother to me too?"

The gray-haired woman's face broke into smiles. "Thank God for giving me a daughter-in-law who knows how to suffer. She sympathizes with me, and I shall love her. Wynne has stumbled on a jewel—and I shall adopt the whole family. Poor child! She looks as if she needed mothering, and what can I do to help her with the brother and sister? I am a happy woman," and sinking back in her chair, she fixed her eyes on the glowing fire, and smiled as her mind ran forward into new and pleasant fields of fancy.

down in the hollow, can be seen, between two walls, from the top one of this house. So from his little window, low down, he winks his lamp so many times. Then I know what he is saying. He is saying the first line of one of those couplets, and from my window I answer with the second line. That is all. It is just a game, a game to keep our hearts up in these sad times, and to make us hope for a day when my Papa, my dear Papa, will be kind to us."

"She was crying openly, poor child, terribly ashamed. My master began to speak to her in a broken voice, but the Colonel held up his hand. He said, 'And you always reply the same thing to any line he has signalled?'"

"Yes. . . . always the same answer. He has not used the last one yet. It is, as you see, mon Colonel, a prayer that Papa will be kind."

"I see. And he is from Alsace, and has a hand that debars him from military service in any country."

"Yes. I—have seen his tears that he could not serve France."

"This house stands very high, Laure, my child. That tiny window where you keep your lamp, your innocent lamp, it could be seen from the north, over many miles of country."

"She lifted her head. She asked, 'What do you mean?'"

"He looked at her, that tall soldier. He saw her spirit, and he replied directly, 'It is said that Monsieur Ehrens is a spy in the pay of Germany; that you do not signal a line of poetry from your high window as you think, but information to the enemy, who can see your lamp from some unknown observation-post as well as Ehrens down there in the town can see it. If that is so, this last line which you have not yet flashed him tells the enemy to open fire on the town as soon as the heavy guns are in position. I know something of that condensed code. . . . Laure!"

"It is not true."

"My poor child!"

"She smiled at them, pale, angry, but quite unshaken in her splendid faith. She said, 'You are quite wrong. I will prove to you that you are wrong,' and slipped from the room. We thought she had gone to cry. 'Let her go,' said the Mayor.

"Ah! Monsieur!"

THE old blinded woman began to rock to and fro on the basket, her hands made sweeping motions as if she would brush away the darkness. Carobert was staring above her head at the shattered spire of the cathedral; the light which had graced it was fading; it was no more than an ugly ruin. . . . He said vaguely, "Had she not gone to weep?"

"Ah! Monsieur! No, Monsieur: She had gone to prove to them that they were wrong. . . ."

"She had gone to signal, from her little north window to that other window low down in the town, the line of the couplet which had never been used."

"And?" the refugee spoke like a man half asleep.

The Canadian Woman Citizen and The Dominion Government

By ELIZABETH BECKER

TO the average Canadian woman, whether she comes from the historic land of Evangeline or from the sunlit prairies of waving gold or from the conservative old central provinces, the Dominion Government and its activities seem rather outside her immediate interests. If some of her own social circle are members of that body, her attitude is reversed and it becomes a very personal matter, but otherwise she does not feel that its deliberations affect her as closely as do those of the province or of her own municipality.

She finds it confusing to remember which departments are controlled by the Dominion and which by the Province, as it often seems a purely arbitrary division. The good man when quizzed thoroughly and with malice aforethought as to which was which answered up promptly and correctly every time. He was asked to give a reason for the knowledge that was in him, and how he got it and kept it in such a "Johnny-on-the-spot" condition, whether all masculine voters had it on this wise, whether any but the feminine voter with the real political glint in her eye could acquire it, and how, when, where, and how much.

He pleaded not guilty to getting it at school, or deliberately setting himself to grind at it later on, but supposed he got it incidentally and painlessly from reading the daily papers and discussing the political situation, as all good citizens, men and women, ought to do. He observed, too, not boastfully, but with due self-respect, that not all men knew all these things, because they were not sufficiently interested to observe them, and that women won't cram up in a few months all the general information on government that men have been gradually absorbing from twenty years of age to the wrong side of forty. If they try it they'll have a mental indigestion that will render their laboriously acquired knowledge of little practical use. However, they have so much lost time to make up that they are ready to try get-wise-quick methods.

Citizenship classes, schools for voters, civic institutes lasting several days, courses of lectures for the winter or fall season, have been found excellent methods of training the neglected adult citizen to new responsibilities. Women's clubs, whatever their object, in church, State or society would find it of the greatest benefit to arrange such courses, with a local or outside leader and the right kind of books on the subject. A short bibliography of practical books on citizenship is appended.

Whatever special course may or may not be taken, the greatest source of information, and one open to all, is the daily press, an education none can afford to overlook. Then a good magazine of condensed intensive information, reports and bulletins of different departments of the Government and of other public institutions ought also to be read. Nor is this reading drudgery, for the writers present their facts in most interesting style. Whether your chief interest is flowers, vegetables, bees or babies, the Government will give you the last word on their proper care.

The Child Welfare Department, the Care of the Feeble-minded, the Juvenile Court, all are facing tremendous problems, and no intelligent and patriotic Canadian woman has a right to remain in blissful ignorance of how her country is striving to meet these vital issues.

To return to our point of departure, the Dominion Government—during the present session the Constitution of Canada is being discussed. In 1867, by the British North America Act, the British Parliament gave Canada control of her own affairs within the bounds laid down by the Act.

During these fifty years many great changes have taken place. Young Canada has grown to manhood, and is now asking the Government of the United Kingdom to grant the Dominion Government the right to amend the B.N.A. Act to meet the needs of the national development of to-day, upon such issues as are agreed upon by all the provinces. At present no changes can be made in this Act but by the Parliament of Great Britain. While it is within the power of the British Parliament to disallow any legislation passed by the Dominion Parliament within two years, or to prevent the enforcement of any law conflicting with British law regarding Canada, these occasions rarely occur. Though Great Britain controls Canadian merchant shipping in Canadian waters, this has various advantages to our country. Canada does not possess any final court of appeal, but in legal actions where appeal is allowed, it must go to the British Privy Council.

As arranged under the B.N.A. Act, there are certain matters that are controlled solely by either the Dominion or the Province, and other matters that are dealt with by both Governments. For instance, the Dominion has complete control of Military and Naval Service, and the Province of hospitals, asylums and charitable institutions, while agriculture is legislated for by both Dominion and Province under certain limitations. Any matters not set apart by the B.N.A. Act as provincial are under the control of the Dominion.

The following list gives the general divisions, those marked (*) being divided between the Dominion and the Province:

Dominion—

- Census and Statistics.
- Currency and Coinage.
- General Taxation.
- Regulation of Commerce.
- Panking.
- Dominion Civil Service.
- *Agriculture.
- Indians and Indian Lands.

They Changed The Food Habits of Millions

Grain Bubbles Now the Queen Foods

Do you realize how Puffed Grains have changed children's food habits?

Think of the whole grains — millions of dishes—now served morning, noon and night. And all displace a lesser food.

The food cells are all exploded by Prof. Anderson's process. Every granule is fitted to digest. So countless children now get in plenty the 16 whole-grain elements.

Made Tempting

Whole grains are now exploded —puffed to eight times normal size.

They come as airy bubbles, flimsy, flaky, nut-like in their taste.

They seem food confections. Children revel in them. Yet they are whole grains cooked as never before—the ideal form of grain food.

The milk dish is more popular. Breakfasts are more delightful. Bedtime is more welcome. And millions of children are being better fed.

All because Prof. Anderson invented this way to puff grains.

With Cream and Sugar or in Bowls of Milk

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice

Steam-Exploded

Puffed to Bubbles 8 Times Normal Size

Serve with cream and sugar. Float in bowls of milk. Mix with your fruits. Use like nut-meats in home candy-making and as wafers in your soups. Crisp and douse with melted butter for hungry children after school. These are all-hour foods, for they easily digest.

Raiment for the June Bride

The Shops Abound With Dainty and Luxurious Pieces for Her Trousseau

By Charlotte M. Storey

THE 1920 springtime bride must have a page all to her own sweet self, for is she not this month, the particular guest of the Journal, whom we all delight to honor? June especially is the bride month, and her brides will be legion, each one of them the most beautiful of them all to her own particular bridegroom.

And clothes a-plenty they must have—but not too many. Pieces duplicated by the dozens and packed away in the green chest, may have been quite the thing in Grandmother's day, but not now. The bride of to-day gathers together a few choice pieces of underwear of silk and fine linen or its equivalent. She culls them from here and there and everywhere, likewise her gowns and wraps and hats and sporting toggery. She buys just what she thinks she can use before they become old fashioned, as they are almost sure to do by another season. Brides no longer lay up treasures for the attic and posterity—at least not in the measure that their mothers did. One walks through the shops and wonders if ever before brides have been offered choice of such beautiful materials and colors, whether for outer or inner wear; and surely we are making progress, for never before has a bride been free to exercise such individuality in choice of a wedding gown. The bodice may be as décolleté as the bride-elect may desire, and instead of the wrist length sleeve which used to be worn almost universally, the wedding gown of to-day may have just no sleeves at all, or a sleeve may start on a career and finish it anywhere caprice suggests, between shoulder and wrist. And, unless one desires it otherwise, the couturier will probably harem hem the skirt around the bottom which will be quite far enough removed from the floor to show a pair of trim ankles encased in white or silver stockings with white satin or silver slippers.

LUSTROUS silks and satins and silver brocades, cloth of silver, laces and tulles, offer the bride a most delectable choice, and ways of draping the veil are more numerous than one can mention, which is just another way of telling the bride that she may drape her wedding veil whatever way is most becoming to her features. Just by way of suggestion, one might say that some are draped across the back, leaving a coronet or ruffle to show above the coiffure and held in place with a bandeau of silver ribbon or orange flowers around the brow. Or, one may mistily drape it over the head, letting it float behind like clouds of vapor.

One must also give much time and thought to the travelling suit, which for the season, should be of some light weight material—silk or perhaps wool jersey. There are endless silken weaves of rare beauty and that will give good service, such as khaki kool, shantung, faille, dew-kist, kumisa, tricolette, plain and drop stitch, which are ideal for travelling and quite the correct thing for summer wear, because they are so light and cool and a top coat can always be worn over them if required. Long, soft lines, with perhaps tuxedo revers and collar and vest lend themselves to these weaves when a smart suit is required.

A TROUSSEAU that does not contain a navy blue taffeta dress surely falls far short of the mark, for of all the practical and eminently useful garments, there is nothing that can take the place of navy blue taffeta, draped on the sides and ruffled if one's slender, or contrived in one of the numberless ways of the straight silhouette. Basques and side draperies are the special proper whim of dress-making Paris at the moment, but while, with her right hand she makes basques and panniers, with her left she produces beautiadjudged just as smartly gowned as she of the abbreviated sleeve, and vice versa; but somehow, one likes to speak a word in favor of the new short sleeve which spells chic every time.

A NOTHER silk dress or two may find itself tucked into the bride's wardrobe. Perhaps it will be foulard or a printed pussy willow with pecan ground and navy blue pattern and the cotton dress for midsummer should not by any chance be overlooked, for this year, if ever, cottons are promised their innings. One feels like suggesting a pretty brown organdy at the very start, but if one wishes to introduce the lighter colors in organdy, why, then there's orchid and buttercup and Nile green—all exquisite shades that will reflect their beauty on the trousseau. Perhaps there'll be a place for white swiss with red or blue dots, trimmed with surplice collar of white organdy with sash to match, and for the dark afternoons when one wants to be dressed up and yet, because of the threatening clouds, one can't be sure it won't rain, there's the printed voile with foulard pattern and satin stripes—a navy or brown ground with the design carried out in some harmonizing tone. Such frocks as these, with an assortment of lace or net vests, lace berthas and a few yards of embroidered tabbing with which to freshen them up from time to time, should be sufficient for most of the springtime brides, unless one wants to add a pretty tricotine or wool jersey, something that would almost have to be held over to start the autumn on.

SUCH a glorious array of separate skirts greets the shopper, that the bride-elect as she makes her way around the shops, won't find making a choice the easiest thing in the world. A white baronet satin, fan-ta-si or georgette crepe would be a happy selection, but if one proposes to leave white for the wash skirt and introduce color, then rose, hydro blue or a Bermuda shade might prove a happy choice. In woollens, large checks and for the golf links, a bright red worsted with white pipings and a narrow white kid belt are both approved of fashion. Don't forget that you may have either your plaid woolen or your silk skirt accordeon pleated. And when one talks, first of suits and then of separate skirts, the logical text for the next paragraph is blouses, one of the most alluring of all fashion texts, because there is so much that is new.

THE blouse that tucks itself in under the belt may be smart, but the one that proclaims itself an outsider is infinitely smarter. It feels no obligation to terminate at the waistline, so it wanders over and below the belt, and perhaps resolves its sides into sashes which tie around the waist; it lends its round neck and lower edge ful models galore with apron draperies and rather low waistline. The collar may be high and ruffled across the top so that the bunch of curls hanging over the ear rests on it; or it may be low and round and ruffled, for the ruffle is no respecter of modes. The sleeves are just as erratic as the collar and she who wears a long sleeve may be 8782—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Size 36 requires 2½ yards 36-inch crêpe de Chine. An excellent blouse for the stout woman is this model with soft fulness on the shoulders. The rolling collar is embroidered in cross-stitch in design 12562.

8753—Ladies' Tunic Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 8760—Ladies' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 40 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 6½ yards 36-inch tricolet—1½ yard lace for collar—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. An odd feature of the long tunic blouse of this frock is the tab-like extensions crossed in surplice style and buttoning onto the tunic. Embroidered motifs in design 12547 form an attractive trimming. They may be worked out in heavy rope silk, in chenille, or yarn.

8758—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 3 yards 54-inch tricotine—¾ yard 40-inch white Georgette crêpe for vestee—¼ yard embroidered organdy for collar—1¼ yard lace edging. No matter how many elaborate frocks the Spring wardrobe contains there must be at least one of these simple straight-line frocks of serge or tricotine, generally brightened with a vestee or collar of white. This model is cut down in a deep V in front to show an inserted vest of white Georgette crêpe hemstitched at the top. The large patch pockets are embroidered in heavy silk in design 12564.

8775—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. Size 36 requires 6 yards 36-inch voile—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The new voiles are lovely, of chiffon-like fineness and softness and come in all the lovely Spring and Summer shades as well as the smart checks and plaids. For this model a plain voile is selected with the decorative motifs supplied by the elaborate border of embroidery which may be worked out in silk floss and soutache in design 12556. The frock is very simple in style with surplice collarless blouse made with the fashionable short sleeves. Under a girdle of self-material the two-piece skirt is attached and over this is arranged a two-piece gathered tunic. Both are closed at left side seam.

8068—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 3¾ yards 36-inch dotted swiss—1¼ yard 45-inch white organdy for bands and collar. Delightful Summer frocks are being fashioned of dotted swiss in dark as well as light shades, the dark ones brightened up occasionally by touches of white organdy. For this model the organdy takes the form of narrow trimming-bands on the two-piece gathered skirt and on the elbow sleeves. Embroidered organdy fashions the long rolling collar which extends in revers that are caught under the belt and reach about to the hips. Embroidered organdy may be purchased by the yard, or plain organdy may be embroidered at home. Any simple design would be suitable, and the edge may be scalloped and buttonholed. To complete this dainty frock the new strapped slippers of white glazed kid should be worn.

8784—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Size 36 requires 1¾ yard 40-inch Georgette crêpe. Despite its long vogue Georgette crêpe still retains its hold on fashionable favor. This blouse closes on the left shoulder and at left side-front and is beaded in design 12549. The beading forms squares with motifs at intervals, and chalk and colored beads may be combined. The colors may be vivid, or in pastel tones.

The Corset You Should Wear

What Is the Style in Corsets for You?

It is the corset style that best expresses your own personality by accenting every natural beauty of your figure.

Natural beauty! Never has Fashion dictated so generously. Just be natural. Buy the corset that will give you comfort; the corset that will give you poise and perfect body proportions without a moment's feeling of restraint; the corset that will accent your every natural charm.

There is not the woman but will be interested in what the world-famed House of Lucile has to say about corsets.

Out of this season's bewildering dictates of Fashion, one thought stands clear—you must appear natural.

Uncorseted? No! Emphatically, no! Certainly frocks and suits never more definitely demanded the foundation of a clever corset. When Paris says you should look "uncorseted," Paris means you should wear a corset so deftly designed to be a part of yourself that it merely accents the natural beauty of your figure and the most critical observer will not be able to trace your charm to its subtle support.

If You Are of Slender Figure

do not think because of your slowness your corset "doesn't matter." It does.

Your chief charm is your poise—that lithe gracefulness that the predestined corset will enhance, and the wrong corset—well, you see on the streets every day glorious youth sacrificed to the fallacy "I'm so slight it doesn't matter what corset I wear."

Have you seen the new Gossard models for the slight figure? You will marvel how so few bones in such gloriously soft materials can mould your hips and thighs and back to such a delightful silhouette.

You will find

If You Are of Average Figure

If you are a matron of average figure with all the possibilities of youthfulness dependent upon the right corset, you will appreciate the Gossard artistry that has given your problem especial care.

Hips and thighs reduce as if by magic; your front and back lines are the straighter lines of youth and you have that graceful poise only to be attained by complete corset comfort.

Remember, your figure tells your age.

If You Are of Full Proportions

do not think of corsetry as a succession of straps and buckles and excessive weight. Just analyze this natural photograph; the figure is as beautifully outlined, as well proportioned as any of the other ideal figures shown on this page. And it is all done so naturally. Gossard artistry has given the woman of full figure the grace and comfort of perfect corsetry.

In a Gossard you will never give the unfashionable impression of being "overcorseted."

8641—Ladies' Jacket. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Length at center-back 30½ inches. No. 8728—Ladies' One-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 30 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The suit in medium size requires 3½ yards 54-inch white tricotine—3 yards 36-inch taffeta for lining jacket. Jackets are shortening up for the Spring and the prevailing tendency is toward youthfulness. This model is the very embodiment of youthfulness with its perky peplum springing out at the sides and its looped-under panels in front. A fitted effect is attained by means of side-front seams extending from the shoulders to the narrow string belt. Very simple skirts complete the tailored suits for Spring like this model which is a one-piece gathered skirt closing at center-back under a plait. White is to be very fashionable and white low shoes of glazed kidskin will be worn, many with the new short French vamps.

8475—Ladies' Coat. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Length at center-back 36 inches. Size 36 requires 3½ yards 54-inch check velours—3¼ yards 36-inch satin for lining. No. 8320—Ladies' One-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 26 requires 2½ yards 36-inch sports crêpe. Short, snappy separate coats like this model are very much in vogue fashioned of homespun or tweed or the new bold checks and plaids. The coat is made with a deep yoke in front and the collar is equally attractive whether worn high or low.

8781—Ladies' Jacket. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Length at center-back 31½ inches. No. 8760—Ladies' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 40 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The suit in medium size requires 3½ yards 54-inch gabardine—2¾ yards 36-inch printed satin for lining jacket. Featured in the Spring fashions are short boxy-looking jackets cut on straight slim lines and this suit typifies the mode admirably. The jacket buttons in single-breasted style and for the neck finish there is a rolling collar. At each side are button-trimmed patch pockets. The skirt is a simple gathered model as are all tailored skirts. The closing is at left side seam.

8440—Ladies' Jacket. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Length at center-back 30½ inches. No. 8728—Ladies' One-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 30 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The suit in medium size requires 1¾ yard 54-inch tricotine—¾ yard 36-inch tricolet for vest—2½ yards 44-inch check worsted for skirt and trimming—3 yards 36-inch satin for jacket lining. Tho strictly tailored suits are as a rule fashioned of the one fabric, sports suits are very often in composé effect, the trimming on the jacket sometimes as in this model repeating the material of the skirt. The jacket is open in front to show a vest of the fashionable tricolet trimmed with bands of check cloth.

8773—Ladies' Slip-on Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Size 36 requires 1¾ yard 40-inch flowered Georgette crêpe—¾ yard 40-inch plain Georgette crêpe. The combination of plain and flowered Georgette crêpe makes a very attractive blouse. It slips on over the head and is slashed at center-front, the slashed edges bound with satin and caught together with ribbon. The long sleeves are of plain Georgette.

8699—Ladies' Long-waisted Kimono Blouse. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Size 36 requires 1¼ yard 40-inch Georgette crêpe. This long-waisted kimono model is typical of the new blouses which either slip on over the head or, as in this case, fasten at the back. This is wrinkled around the waistline to form a girdle effect and is beaded in design 12470. The blouse is seamed along the outside of the sleeves and under the arms and tiny plaits are formed at the underarm front and back and stitched in with the seam. The sleeves are short and the oval neck collarless.

8679—Ladies' Tunic Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 8574—Ladies' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 38 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires  $5\frac{1}{4}$  yards 54-inch white gabardine.

chenille, or worsted in design 12422. A panel is arranged over the front-closing waist, the panel closing on the left shoulder and at left side-front. The neck is collarless and the sleeves are lengthened with wide flaring cuffs.

8213—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{3}{4}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{3}{4}$  yards 44-inch check worsted— $\frac{1}{4}$  yard 36-inch white tricolet for collar— $\frac{2}{3}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Agreeable contrast to the tailored frocks of solid-color serge and tricotine is afforded by the many models that make use of check worsted. This frock tho in one-piece style really combines a blouse and a four-piece gathered skirt attached under a girdle of self-material. At the sides just below the hips a trimming-band is applied that gives the modish outstanding pocket effect. A panel is arranged on the front of the dress which buttons onto the rolling collar of tricolet, and the dress closes at the left side-front. On the long one-piece sleeves between the elbow and the wrist a trimming-band is applied caught together on the outside with a fancy button. The band may be lined with contrasting satin.

8111—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{5}{8}$  yard. Size 36 requires 3 yards 54-inch wool Jersey. A simple practical model untrimmed save for motifs of embroidery in design 12510. These may be carried out in bright-colored worsted or in heavy rope silk. It is a matter of individual choice whether this frock closes at the center-front or the side-front, and altho the illustration gives the effect of the dress being in two sections with the skirt attached at low waist-line, in reality the frock is in one from neck to lower edge and the stitching is used to give the two-piece effect. A dart is formed on the shoulders in front to give a closer fit.

8370—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{3}{8}$  yards 44-inch check cloth— $\frac{1}{4}$  yard 36-inch white tricolet for vest. From the vest revers roll back that extend around to form the collar and under the belt of self-material the two-piece skirt is attached to the waist. Large patch pockets are applied at the sides. Pumps of white kidskin would complete this Spring frock very attractively. Little arrow-heads of embroidery in design 12422 are worked out in heavy black rope silk on the lower part of the revers. This frock would be equally attractive in dark blue serge or tricotine and it is also an excellent model for the simple Summer frock of gingham, chambray, or linen. If the dress is of blue serge the embroidery may be in bright-colored wool.

It is Dangerous to Use Counterfeit Parts for the # Ford

BY allowing your garage man to use imitation parts in repairing your car you not only invite repeated repair bills and more serious breakdowns, but you actually endanger your own life and the lives of others. Cheap and inferior parts used in connection with the steering control are liable to cause accidents of a very serious nature.

You Risk Your Life When You Use Imitation Spindles

In a recent test the tensile strength of the genuine Ford Vanadium Steel spindle arm was found to be over 100% more than that of the counterfeit machine steel part. The arms were submitted to shock, and the counterfeit arm broke at a pulling force equivalent to 11,425 pounds applied to a cross section. The same pulling force applied to a corresponding cross section of a genuine Ford spindle arm did not even change its original size or shape. In order to separate the genuine spindle arm it was necessary to apply a pulling force of 25,000 pounds.

The spindle arm is one of the vital parts entering into the control of a car, and by using spurious parts in such places, Ford owners are risking lives and property.

You are merely protecting yourself and avoiding repeated repair bills when you demand genuine Ford parts.

In the meantime a small host of musical experts have been scouring the rural districts and recording in permanent form the tunes and the figures that had been handed down from generation to generation on May Day and at Harvest Home. A great number of folk-pieces, most of them with very quaint names have been collected and published and the wide diffusion of them is shown by the following list of English counties in which they have been gathered: Gloucestershire, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Cornwall, Monmouthshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Northumberland, Warwickshire, Worcestershire and Surrey. In many parts of Canada there must be old men and women who were familiar with the Morris dances long before musicians were at pains to investigate them and organize a national movement for their revival.

In connection with Morris dancing the custom of "Dressing Up" with ribbons, and sometimes with masks has prevailed for centuries. An old Lancashire ditty runs:

Morris dance is a very pretty tune,
Lads and lassies plenty,
Every lad shall have his lass
And I'll have four and twenty.

My new shoone they are so good,
I could dance Morris if I would,
And if hat and coat be dressed,
I will dance Morris with the best.

THE father of the movement for the revival of folk dancing is an Englishman named Cecil Sharp, a Londoner who in his younger days was an organist and choirmaster in Australia, and once made a concert tour through Canada as a baritone singer. Becoming interested in the revival of folk-dancing, he, some years ago, founded the Vacation School for the teaching of Folk dancing at Stratford-upon-Avon, in connection with the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre there. The school outgrew Shakespeare's birthplace and moved to Chelsea, London, where in the last Christmas vacation no fewer than four hundred teacher-students from various parts of England attended. Here they learned the intricacies of the Morris dances, some of which are more simple than they appear in execution. They were instructed when to bend the knee, and when to hop with leg straight, when to flourish stick or handkerchief, and picked up the vocabulary or lingo of the dances, which is quaint. It is generally admitted that in these dances there is something much more healthy and stimulating than the dances of the modern ball room.

Curiously enough it has been found that some modern airs are as readily adaptable to the old dance movements as the traditional tunes. For instance sixty years ago there was an air that was popular throughout America, known as "Buffalo Gals." Readers of "Tom Sawyer" will perhaps recall that it was a favorite of Mark Twain's boyhood. About 1860 it was taken to England by the Christy Minstrels and after temporary vogue in London was forgotten. Five or six years ago the folk-dance investigators found it being used as a Morris dance in a remote country spot to which it had penetrated a few decades previously. And I also note that Mr. Cecil Sharp's dancers at Chelsea, used Stephen Foster's air "Old Black Joe" presumably at a faster tempo than in the song. To those readers who are interested in the matter, I would commend, in addition to the publications of Mr. Sharp, a little book, "English Folk-Song and Dance," by Frank Kidson and Mary Neal, published by the Cambridge University Press in 1915.

Sewing as a Handwork For Girls

HANDWORK has long been regarded as an effective means of education for children. A normal child is always ready to make something, and the trained kindergarten teacher makes use of this natural instinct in her work of guiding the little ones towards full self development.

During recent years the place of handwork in the training of older children has been receiving more attention, and most educationists agree as to its value. Critics outside the schools sometimes object on the score of expense, for the apparatus and materials required may add considerably to the cost of school equipment. Critics in the schools object to handwork for the sake of handwork as a waste of precious school time, and maintain that there should be definite correlation between handwork and other subjects in the curriculum.

INSTRUCTORS of sewing may justly claim that a good needlework course is the most valuable form of handwork for girls. It is not open to criticism on the ground of expense, for it has been shown that the cost of the materials can be refunded by the sale of the garments made at cost price.

Lessons in sewing can be so graded that the girls derive as much benefit as from other forms of handwork, while at the same time they are learning a useful accomplishment. The delicate muscles of the fingers are exercised, and the action of eye and hand co-ordinated. Skill is gained in the use of implements and the importance of accurate measurements, and careful finish is soon discovered. There is scope for the development of an appreciation of good lines and pleasing colours, and for the exercise of individual taste and ingenuity.

SEWING is by no means isolated from other school subjects. The girl will find her lessons in Arithmetic and Drawing useful in calculating prices, in making measurements, in drafting patterns, and in outlining for embroidery. It could be shown how the study of Literature, History, and Geography may be interesting from the needlewoman's point of view.

Needlecraft should not be regarded as a non-essential part of a girl's education, a fad or a frill, but as a subject which may awaken the same justifiable pride in personal manual achievement, which characterized the master workmen of the Great Trade Guilds of the Middle Ages.

SEAMS

Seams in garments are necessary when two pieces of material are to be joined together and the kind of seam to be made depends upon the texture of the material used.

Different Methods of Making Seams in Garments.

(a) THE SEW AND FELL SEAM used for pillow cases, whitewear and the like.

The overhanding in this seam is worked on the right side of the goods and the edges must be quite together.

The overhanding must be well flattened with the thumb before the fell is basted.

(b) RUN AND FELL SEAM used for underclothing, etc.

This seam is only used on thin material as it is not strong enough to bear strain.

As only the edge of the back piece is turned, care is necessary to avoid fixing the front too high, thus causing the frayed edge to rise above the folded one. If the raw edge is trimmed with the scissors only the fringe must be cut, not the threads of the goods.

To begin this seam, first run on the wrong side. For children it is a good plan to either crease or pencil mark where the stitches should go.

The fell or hem is then worked on the wrong side. One must exercise great care in making this seam perfectly flat as it is likely to ridge on the right side of the goods if not properly pressed out.

The seam when finished should be the same width all the way down. Often inexperienced needlewomen get the beginning and the ending too wide.

(c) FRENCH SEAM (so called).

This is found suitable for unlined clothing as the right and wrong sides are both neat and no hemming shows on the right side. It also lends itself admirably to machining and is therefore very frequently used.

To work this seam, first run the wrong sides facing each other, then run the right sides after the first stitching has been well pressed out.

(d) MANTUA MAKER'S SEAM.

This seam is only suitable for very thin materials such as voiles, muslins, etc., as the fold is rather thick.

The back piece of the goods is kept a little higher than the front and then both sides are turned down to form a fell. The hemming is now worked on the wrong side.

(e) COUNTER HEMMED SEAM used for pinafores, etc.

to ruffles and in this and in almost all its other forms, is truly beautiful and undoubtedly wearable. And while it has all the earmarks of an aristocrat, it is so democratic that one finds it made up in every kind of material from plain white cotton voile to exquisite indestructible silk voile and becoming extremely popular in tricolette and cartridge cloth.

A TRAVELLING top coat is almost as essential as the travelling suit, and here one looks for the practical as well as the smart cut. And coupled with the coat, one finds the new spring wrap that envelops the wearer while it engages all her attention as she holds it around her, wrap-fashion. Beautiful duvetyns, tricotines, tricolettes, satins and soft silks go into its composition and a high, turn-over collar surmounts it. But to get back to the practical coat, one may mention that there is nothing more modish than a nice quality of camel's hair cloth made up into either a long or short coat, unless it is one of those swagger English storm coats, which never seems to get old-fashioned no matter how long one may have it nor how fashion of other garments may change. There are short or medium length coats that we call sport coats, which are smart looking and are being shown in the most beautiful shades of blue and green—bordering on the French and the peacock blue—silvertones, and exceedingly attractive are the heather mixtures in wool jersey.

PARTICULAR to be in the fashion of the period, the bride will select a chapeau with cire trimmings, if indeed the entire hat be not made of material with waxed finish, and if it so happens that she is lucky enough to be buying three or four hats, then she can abundantly revel in flowers.

Those 3 Chops

Would Buy a 60-Dish Package of Delicious Quaker Oats

That's a rather big fact to consider.

The 40-cent package of Quaker Oats will make 60 liberal dishes. The chops will serve but three.

So with meats or eggs or fish.

The 40 cents which buys a 60-dish package of Quaker Oats doesn't go far in meat foods.

It would buy you, for instance, eight eggs.

Yet the oat dish, as nutriment, is vastly superior. It is nearly a complete food—almost the ideal food. And the 40-cent package contains as many calories as seven pounds of round steak.

Each dollar spent for Quaker Oats buys as much nutrition as $9 spent for meat, eggs and fish on the average.

You get nine for one, based on calories per dollar. See the table below.

The 40-cent package of Quaker Oats yields 6,221 calories, the energy measure of food value. Note what that same nutrition costs in other necessary foods at this writing.

This argues for Quaker Oats breakfasts. Serve other foods at dinner, for you need variety. But start the day with this supreme food and this money-saving dish.

Everybody needs it every day.

Alberta and Manitoba Women's Institutes Hold Successful Annual Conventions

Gertrude Dutton, Acting Supervisor of the Manitoba Women's Institutes.

THE Alberta Women's Institutes have just completed their sixth annual convention held in Edmonton and the report of Miss Mary MacIsaac shows an increase of 32 institutes, making a total of 265, with a membership of 13,150, the largest women's organization in Alberta to-day.

The convention itself was not a news convention. It was an intensive convention in that the work of the institutes, through the constituency conveners, was given in detail and from these details the delegates gleaned invaluable hints and inspirations to take back to their own communities and push onward and enthusiastically institute work in every part of the province.

It was a convention that had a predominant feature and this was music, music that ran through it like a great drama and the music consisted of "the songs that live"—the old, old, songs that everybody knows and everybody loves. One cannot write of just the exquisite pleasure the Alberta Women's Institutes delegates received from Mrs. Rose Morgan of Columbia University, New York, who came to them, without charging even a fee and brought with her the wonderful secret that everyone possesses within her own community the medium of entertainment that is so divinely simple and easy that it has been overlooked in the present age of "Jazz" and "Ragtime" music. Its simplicity is its greatness and modern folk in their mad rush to be up-to-date have lost sight of the fact that songs live because of their chastity, simplicity and artistry. This is why "Annie Laurie" is the world's greatest love song. Mrs. Morgan dwelt on the singing of Canadian patriotic songs, dividing them in three groups: "The Maple Leaf"—which she defined as pretty—"O Canada," she taught the delegates to sing to bring out its inspiration and then she followed on to "Land of Hope and Glory," which she said is majestic and imposing—the grandest of our national songs.

Not a Convention of Resolutions.

It was not a Resolving convention for the resolutions were few and far between—the greater bulk of them being left to the provincial advisory board. The convention endorsed unanimously a higher minimum wage for girls—raising it from $9 per week, which is set by the Factory Act, to $15 per week. Another resolution endorsed was that a free correspondence course be given on food values to the mothers, by the Department of Agriculture. Considerable discussion centred around three resolutions, having to do with education, one dealing with the teaching of mothercraft in the schools; another, religious teaching, and a third, the teaching of French in the public school. The mothercraft resolution was defeated because of the difficulty that teachers were not trained to do this and many teachers were young men. Regarding religious teaching, it was decided to confine it to Bible stories and the Lord's prayer and not the Ten Commandments, as it was stated, there were different versions of these in different creeds. The teaching of French in the public schools was defeated as it was thought the curriculum was overloaded already and English needed perfecting to such a degree that there was no room for French in the public schools. Another educational resolution to the effect that special stress be laid on the subjects of English, composition, writing, spelling and elementary arithmetic in the public schools, was carried unanimously. The Calgary Institute sent in a resolution, which was passed requesting the Dominion Government to increase the pensions accorded the dependents of soldiers and this, too, regardless of rank.

The new pin of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada. Any Institute member is entitled to wear this pin.

Further resolutions carried were, that the age of consent for girls, be raised from 14 to 21 years, that it be a criminal offence for any man and woman to register falsely as man and wife, that no person be allowed to marry without a clean bill of health, that disapproval be voiced against performing animals, because of the cruelty in their training and that teachers be asked to teach and explain a code of laws requested from the Dominion Government regarding the meaning and abuse of the flag.

Another point brought out in the convention was that the Institutes, according to their constitution are allowed to discuss political questions, but not from a party-politics standpoint. The meaning of the word "politics"—measures to promote the welfare of the state—is entirely within the constitution and there should be no misapprehension regarding this.

Thanks Canadian Home Journal.

A resolution of thanks for the courtesy and space given by the Canadian Home Journal was passed and also one of endorsement of it as a medium of Institute members receiving Institute news. It was especially commended by Miss Noble, the provincial president, and Mrs. Arthur Murphy, the National president.

Convention of Unanimity.

It was a convention of unanimity. Not that there weren't differences of opinion backed up with constructive logic, but there were no disgruntled factions—nothing was being "rail-roaded" through—and everyone kept her eye on the great slogan of the Institutes, "For Home and Country." The spirit of unanimity was shown in the election of the Provincial Advisory Board, for each officer was returned unanimously. The good will of the convention was shown to Miss MacIsaac, the superintendent, and Miss Noble, the president, in the presentation of beautiful bouquets of flowers. The convention wished to include the secretary also—but she intervened and nipped the idea in the bud—so emphatically that no one had the courage to include her in the honors of the day.

Like other years, the March snow storms delayed the delegates. Every year some delegates have been storm stayed, en route, and in order to prevent this occurring in future, the Alberta Women's Institutes will hold their conventions in June. This was agreed to unanimously, and an invitation was extended to the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada to hold its convention in June, 1921—in conjunction with Alberta.

The Work of the Past Year.

From the superintendent, Miss MacIsaac, was learned the aggressive campaign of Institute work of the year. Twenty-one thousand women have attended the short courses given under the auspices of the Alberta Women's Institutes. Home Nursing and First Aid has been given at 54 centres, sewing at 22 centres, cookery and food values at 16 centres. One hundred and twenty-eight Institutes were visited by W. I. speakers. Nineteen constituency conferences were held, these being particularly helpful in developing leadership and community work in each constituency.

An important feature of 1919, was the campaign for the proper feeding of children, this being carried out by food exhibits at the Edmonton and Calgary fairs. This was followed up by the distribution of 30,000 bulletins on menus for children from the ages of one to seven years. Indeed, all the short courses are supplemented with bulletins, there being 6,000 copies of pamphlets on "Canning of meat, vegetables and fruit," and 4,000 on suggestions for the health of children, distributed.

Relief Work.

The Alberta Women's Institutes have helped 2,300 people in the drought areas. Nearly 30,000 articles of second-hand clothing have been dispensed and $6,000 worth of new clothing. All the relief work appears in the W. I. Relief depot report as Institutes in the drought areas carry on their own work.

Women's Institute Scholarship Fund.

Two Institutes have awarded scholarships to two girls and thus enabled them to attend one of the agricultural schools of Alberta. This scholarship fund is one of the new aims of the A.W.I. of 1919. In order to send a girl to one of the agricultural schools for a period of five months, it takes the sum of $200. The test for these scholarships is a five day short course in Household Science put on in various centres—the scholarship being awarded to the applicant showing the most interest and obtaining the highest marks.

Rest Rooms.

There are thirty-six W. I. rest rooms in Alberta and of this number, approximately one-third own their own buildings. In some instances, the buildings are worth from $3,500 to $6,000, the valuation of the average community room being from $1,000 to $2,000. The majority of the rooms are rented, the yearly rental ranging from $36.00 to $400.00. A number of these have been built as memorial halls to the heroes of the Great War.

W. I. Girls' Clubs.

The W. I. Girls' Clubs, provided for in an amendment to the Women's Institute Act at the 1919 session of the Alberta Legislature, now number 40 with a membership of 840 girls.

One whole day of the convention was given to Girls' Club work and the girl delegates elected their Provincial Advisory Board at the close of it with the following results: president, Miss Edna Francisco, Cavendish; first vice-president, Miss Alice Gates, Stoney Plain; second vice-president, Miss Minnie Page, Elnora; third vice-president, Miss Delia Fleming, Alliance; secretary-treasurer, Miss Daisy Hummell, Milk River; directors, Miss Evelyn Jochem, Milk River; Miss Marjorie Anderson, Stoney Plain; Miss Mamie Johnson, Provost and Miss Clara Smith, Alliance.

Miss Bessie McDermid gave a carefully thought out address on suggestions for 1920 programmes. To the younger girls, sports appeal; as they grow older, business meetings and sewing meetings, the latter along competition lines being most appealing, and from fifteen to eighteen years the study of civics, beautifying the home, etc. Picnics and paper chases are helpful in training quick eyes, accurate movement, fair play and team work. The study of dramatic art gives poise and voice modulation. Every club should give part of its time to the study of literature, mock trials, debates, home economics, interior decoration, bead-work, basketry, choral music, music composers and dietetics.

Reports were brought from Botha, Coronation, Stoney Plain, Carmangay, Cavendish, Collingwood, Carstairs, Elnora, Argyle, Gem, Milk River, Munson, New Dayton, Olds, Stanger, Aldersyde, Wetaskiwin, Daysland, Talbot, Minburn and Queenston. West Wind has the largest club, the membership being fifty.

Better School Movement.

In connection with the better school movement, nearly every Institute has an educational committee. Mrs. Aylesworth, provincial convener on education, showed that 25 schools have playground equipment owing to the efforts of Institutes, that 25 have been provided with sanitary drinking cups and with towels. At Clive, Olds, Garrington, Carmangay, the hot lunch is an accomplished fact, and here an attempt is made to prepare at least one hot dish to supplement the lunch sent by the parents. Mrs. Aylesworth urged the Institutes to provide school libraries with suitable books, especially those of Canadian authors; to visit the schools, to launch campaigns for women school trustees, and to get acquainted with the teacher and see that she has a suitable place to board. Twenty-five Institutes have given prizes for various competitions in drawing, essays and agriculture.

Educational Progress of Alberta.

In connection with the educational work of the Institute, Mr. George P. Smith, Minister of Education, gave an address on "The Educational Progress in Alberta." He stated that it was the purpose of Alberta to push the consolidated school movement by making it easier financially, by increased grants, to erect these schools, and to remove petty jealousies of the site by giving the townspeople no vote. Twelve had been built last year.

There has been increased inspection in rural schools to the extent of 50 per cent. Every school has been inspected once, and most of them twice. Alberta is spending $50,000 more on the inspection of her schools this year than last, and the territory of each inspector has been cut down one-third.

Special encouragement has been given to the two-roomed school and to the introduction of high school work. Twice the grant, $400.00, has been given to any school taking up high school work with six or more pupils. A grant of $200.00 is given for each additional room, and if the school is used as a social centre, a further grant of $250.00 is given to provide suitable furniture. Twelve new two-roomed schools have been built, while 27 are under way. Thus the province is establishing high school centres, for those schools receiving high school grants must take high school pupils, whether they reside in the district or not, and the province pays the fees.

Accommodation for the teacher is another policy of the Alberta Department of Education in the building of teachers' homes. These are built on five acres of land, and the home is a real home, with decent furniture provided. This is to encourage the married teacher to go to the rural communities, as one of the big problems has been the teacher who leaves every term.

The Department also pays a grant of $300 to every school taking up high school work in the province, and an additional grant of $300 if the schools will take outside pupils, the Department paying the fees. This has resulted in high school work being installed in schools all over the province, and opportunities for higher education for the farm boys and girls are increasing enormously.

Three hundred rooms were opened in Alberta last year, and the shortage of teachers has been cut down by 200. The average teacher's salary of Alberta is $916—the second largest in Canada, Saskatchewan being in the lead with an average salary of $1,000.

It is the professional policy of Alberta to eliminate all examinations up to Grade I. It is now the personal duty of the teacher to superintend the children during the noon and play hour, and to stimulate the play the Department is giving a small grant of $15 to provide playground equipment.

The non-English-speaking people need 500 more teachers. The problem of Canadianizing the foreigner will be solved, said Mr. Smith, when these teachers can be obtained.

Child Welfare and Public Health.

Mrs. D. R. McIvor, of Cowley, provincial convener of child welfare and public health, stated that ten Institutes had put on child welfare campaigns and had been addressed by Mr. C. Bishop, child welfare secretary. Others had been instrumental in establishing hospitals and boards of health. The Fairview Institute in the Peace River country has succeeded in getting two district nurses with special training in obstetrics. Mrs. McIvor advocated the extension of the Mothers' Pension Act to include deserted mothers, a free domestic science correspondence course—especially dealing with food values—for mothers, the encouragement of the establishment of child welfare stations, the entering of Alberta babies in the Canadian Home Journal Better Baby contest, a health crusade similar to the "Queen Mary's Health Legion," which is a system of giving marks for cleanliness, the stages of progress being marked by the giving of buttons and honor pins. She deprecated the wearing of insufficient and immodest clothing among our girls, and suggested an educational campaign against the present fashions in shoes, owing to their injury to health. She deplored the growing cigarette habit from a health and moral standpoint, and in closing advocated her cordial appreciation of the Alberta Health Department.

Alberta Leads in Progressive Legislation.

In presenting her report on laws, Mrs. H. V. Montgomery said that, in looking over the year 1919, Alberta leads the whole of Canada in progressive legislation. As instances she cited the Mothers' Allowance Act, the Municipal Hospital Act, the Public Health Nurses Act, amendment to the Venereal Disease Act, the Factory Act, etc. There are a number of Acts up before the present session of the Legislature, inclusive of the creation of scholarship funds of $1,200 for Canadian students in Paris for the purpose of allowing students or teachers to follow up a post graduate course in that city, only three holding scholarships at the same time. There is an Act before the House now, granting equal parental rights to the mother, who is given the same control over the education, the estate and conduct of the children as the father, and another amendment considering the registering of unmarried mothers and their infants by the persons receiving them for accouchement.

Household Economics Work.

Miss Bessie MacDermid, provincial convener of Household Economics, advocated that every Institute should give a five-minute period at every meeting to "Good Marketing," which means, not the buying of the cheapest article, but the knowledge of the standard of the article required. This year the Alberta W.I. demonstrators and a number of W.I. speakers will give demonstration-lectures on "How to Buy Foods." The short course in foods and cookery is planned, also, according to the present economic needs, and the Institutes are taking a strong, material step in a "make your dollars work harder" campaign.

Miss Noble's Address.

Year by year Institute delegates look forward to Miss Isabel Noble's address for its earnestness, its inspiration and its humor, as Miss Noble has a fund of witty stories which she tells in her own inimitable style. Her first point this year was the beautifying of the home. A beautiful home she defined as one that was arranged with the utmost simplicity, where the principle of elimination and its relation to comfort was involved rather than having everything that money can buy. She dwelt on pictures, emphasizing prints of the old masters instead of enlarged photographs of the family relatives that stared every visitor out of countenance.

Miss Noble again urged the continuance of the $200.00 scholarship fund.

She reiterated, from last year, her admonishment to Institute members for being tardy, saying it is just as much a sin to steal time as to steal any other thing, and yet most of us do it.

She commended the quiet, simple lives of the wives of our farmer Premiers—Mrs. Drury, of Ontario, and Mrs. Stewart of Alberta, the former being an ardent Institute worker.

She advocated that each Institute take up a course in "Community Civics," and thus become more effective citizens. This would train us to think straight on civic problems, to observe more carefully and understand more clearly our government and arouse in us an interest in our own community affairs.

Hot Lunch.

And, lastly, Miss Noble advanced a very complete and constructive plan of the installation of the hot lunch in the rural schools. She stated that ninety per cent. of the children in Alberta take their lunches to school, and the usual way of eating this is a real menace to their health and manners. To install this meant co-operation of the teachers, trustees, parents and children. It is necessary first to have an enthusiastic teacher. Miss Noble had gleaned information from one teacher who has successfully carried out this scheme, it being arranged as follows: One family brings milk, another cocoa, another sugar, while she furnishes the potatoes, butter, salt, pepper, flour, soda and canned soups. (The school trustees would be willing in most cases to provide these articles.) At recess the potatoes were put on to bake, the soup heated at noon. When serving, the children marched around the room, got their dishes from the table, marched to the stove, where the teacher served them, and back to their seats, where serviettes had been placed to save the desks. The children brought their own cups, plates and spoons from home. This teacher reports that the children did much better work in the afternoon after the hot lunch, and that the attendance was more regular. She also paid some attention to their manners, this requiring a good deal of tact. The children themselves were most enthusiastic over the idea.

Miss Noble presented the following menu for the hot lunch dish, this menu having been tried out successfully in the schools of Tacoma:

Monday—Tomato soup, cocoa, half pint of milk.

Tuesday—Corn bread, apple sauce and cocoa, half pint of milk.

Wednesday—Vegetable soup, cocoa, half pint of milk.

Thursday—Baked beans, cocoa, half pint of milk.

Friday—Celery soup, cocoa, half pint of milk.

Each of these dishes cost five cents. With the soup is given a cracker, with the cocoa a cookie, and a straw with the sealed half pint of milk, so that it can be drunk slowly.

MONARCH-KNIT HOSIERY

THE smooth trim fit so much admired in Monarch-Knit Hosiery is due partly to the absence of seams and partly to the special shaping process followed in knitting the ankles and feet. The special elastic ribbed top makes the stocking fit closely, comfortably, smoothly, without binding. To good looks we add the assurance of long wear by double-splicing heels and toes and by a rigid system of inspection that keeps the quality uniformly high.

You will find at your dealer's a complete display. All the latest shades for men and women, in fine silk and mercerized cotton.

the national federation. This was done through the various conveners in their report through Mrs. J. N. Beaubier, one of Alberta's directors on the national executive, who gave a clear and concise account of the national federation, but most of all through the address of Mrs. Arthur Murphy, the national president. Mrs. Murphy appealed for the support of the delegates in carrying out the national policies, such as health education, etc. She said the National would like to be able to send Mrs. Morgan to every province in the Dominion, but their first difficulty was lack of funds, and she asked for $5,000.00 from Alberta to help push Institute work through its greatest medium, the national federation. Before the convention was complete, donations for this purpose were handed in to the provincial secretary, Mrs. A. H. Rodgers. In closing, Mrs. Murphy said that the National Federation of the Institutes generally had no quarrel with any organization, and it required no insight to see the value of a national organization, bonded together by the most sacred and powerful of all ties—Home and Country.

Other Speakers at the Convention.

This was not a convention of outside speakers, such as that of last year, the only outside woman speaker being Mrs. L. C. McKinney, M.L.A., who gave a fine address on "The Present Tense of the Woman Question."

Greetings were brought from the Edmonton Women's Institute by the president, Mrs. Nellie McClung; the Edmonton Local Council of Women, by Mrs. Forbes Reid, and an address of welcome was given by Mayor Clark, of Edmonton, which was replied to by Mrs. M. E. Roy, Chauvin. Addresses were delivered by His Honor, Lieutenant-Governor Brett, Premier Stewart, Mr. James Ramsay, M.L.A. The Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Duncan Marshall, owing to illness, was unable to fill his part on the programme.

The entertainment feature of the convention was not overlooked, this consisting of an organ recital given by Mr. Herbert Wild, A.R.C.O., vocal solos by Mrs. Cockburn, pianoforte solos by Miss Eva Blasdel, A.T.C.M., while an amateur play, "A Snug Little Kingdom," was put on by the Forbes Robertson Amateur Dramatic Society under the direction of Ethel Reese Burns, who gave a list of suitable amateur plays and a talk on the details of the presentation of these. A reception at Government House concluded a very successful convention.

The officers for the ensuing year are: President, Miss Isabel Noble, Daysland; first vice-president, Mrs. W. H. Fleming, Alliance; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. A. H. Rodgers, Ft. Saskatchewan; district directors, No. 1, northern, Mrs. Jas. Boyd, Van-rena; No. 2, northern, Mrs. C. A. Gates, Stoney Plain; central district, Mrs. A. A. Townes, Coronation; and southern district, Mrs. F. Hughes, Cavendish. Conveners of standing committees for the year are: Education, Mrs. Aylesworth, Olds; public health and child welfare, Mrs. D. R. McIvor, Cowley; publicity, Mrs. J. F. Price, Calgary; household economics, Miss Bessie McDermid; immigration, Mrs. W. Barss, Delia; laws, Mrs. H. Y. Montgomery, Wetaskiwin. Constituency conveners are: Peace River, Mrs. T. A. Norris; Pembina, Mrs. R. Wheatley, Westlock; Lac Ste. Anne, Mrs. Crafts, Onaway; Edson, Mrs. J. K. Taylor, Mahaska; Grouard, Mrs. Brown, High Prairie; St. Albert, Mrs. J. Armstrong, St. Albert; Vegreville, Miss Agnes Goodall, Tofield; Victoria, Mrs. Wilmerroth, Ft. Saskatchewan; Vermilion, Mrs. J. ### MANITOBA INSTITUTES' PROGRESS DURING PAST YEAR.

By Elizabeth Bailey Price.

The annual report of Mr. S. T. Newton, superintendent of the Women's Institutes of Manitoba, tells in a very concise statement the story of this work for 1919. He has culled the news items of the work of each branch, and the news items mean that they are slogans of the branches. These he has grouped, and in a very short space the splendid work of the Manitoba Women's Institutes is emphatically chronicled.

"The year of 1919 has been a difficult one for the Women's Institutes of Manitoba," says Mr. Newton, "owing to the Spanish influenza epidemic, the strike and the reaction of the war, but the number of Women's Institute branches has grown from 112 to 127."

This may seem a small number in comparison with the other cities, but Mr. Newton believes in the principle of having every Institute a strong one, rather than a great many branches, with the chances of some of them dying, as is very often the case. Then the province of Manitoba has a different distribution of its population than the other provinces, more than half of it being in the city of Winnipeg—and Women's Institutes are primarily rural organizations.

Institutes Still Do War Work.

As is the case in other provinces, Manitoba Institutes have given more time to community work rather than patriotic, this latter work being used in its relation to war. However, a number of branches have continued still to raise money for patriotic purposes. These include: Ashern, Austin, Belmont, Benito, Beresford, Bird's Hill, Brandon, Boissevain, Clearwater, Darlingford, Dauphin, Delta, Deloraine, Dominion City, Dugald, Durban, Eden, Edrans, Ethelbert, Emerson, Elva, Ellenville, Elkhorn, Flee Island, Gimli, Hartney, Lenore, Lidstone, Lundar, Lyleton, La Riviere, Moline, Macdonald, Mill Creek, Minnedosa, Oakburn, Oak Bluff, Pilot Mound, Reston, Rivers, Roland, Rockwood, Rosser, Selkirk, Souris, Shellmouth, Valley River and Whitewater. In addition to these, the following towns have contributed to the Children's Aid Society of Winnipeg: Belmont, Brandon, Burnside, Delta, Dominion City, Elkhorn, Foxwarren, Gimli, Kenton, Lenore, Lidstone, Mayfeld, Neepawa, Oakburn, Roland, Moline, Killarney, Shellmouth, Souris, Swan River and Whitewater. Oakburn, Roland, Treherne, Austin and Holland have adopted French war orphans.

Helping Needy in Community.

Charleswood, Arizona, Deloraine, Bird's Hill, Ethelbert, Macdonald, Mayfeld and Valley River have assisted needy persons in their own community.

Basswood, Deloraine and Ellenville have sent boxes of clothing to the drought-stricken regions farther west.

Bird's Hill, Beresford, Birtle, Dominion City, Durban, Deloraine, Edrans, Foxwarren, Gilbert Plains, Gladstone, Kenton, Melita, Minnedosa, Mill Creek, Miniota, Petersfield, Sols-girth, Virden, Rivers, Winnipegosis, have libraries, either their own or a travelling library. These do not include the travelling libraries which, with the beginning of 1920, the Extension Service has secured, to loan to the rural communities requesting them.

Bird's Hill, Birtle, Brandon, Boissevain, Burnside, Deloraine, Dauphin, Binscarth, Emerson, Gladstone, Flee Island, Killarney, Lundar, Lyleton, Foxwarren, Macdonald, Melita, Minnedosa, Pilot Mound, Portage la Prairie, Reston, Rivers, Souris, Elkhorn, Swan River, Kenton, Valley River and Virden have either a rest room or a

YOU can rely on Carhartt Overalls, Made in America, to please the menfolk and give you full value for your money. For example, some overalls have the double seams only where they are seen—my Carhartt Overalls are double seamed throughout. Some manufacturers use "Seconds" and "job-lot" fabrics; I use first-grade denim and khaki entirely. Most overall suspenders cannot slip off the shoulders nor get separated in the wash. My overalls are made in generous sizes, with plenty of room for free action. They have all the comfort devices a man requires in overalls—and the price is reasonable. Each pair carries my unqualified guarantee.

Dishes That Men Like

WE ARE always looking for dishes that will please the masculine taste—dishes which, once eaten, often reappear "by special request." In these Perfection Salad and Snow Pudding recipes you will find such dishes, for they have won universal favor with the men wherever they have been served—and I know they have been favorites in my own home for years.

Not only will the masculine members of your family appreciate these dishes but you will like them too, because they are easy to make and may be made with syrup in place of sugar, when that precious article is scarce or is impossible to get.

PERFECTION SALAD

- |                                    |   |
|------------------------------------|---|
| 1 envelope KNOX Sparkling Gelatine | 1/2 cup sugar or 1/2 cupful of syrup                        |
| 1/2 cup cold water                 | 1 teaspoonful salt  |
| 1/2 cup mild vinegar               | 1 cup cabbage, finely shredded                              |
| 2 cups boiling water               | 1/4 can sweet red small peppers or fresh peppers finely cut |
| 2 cups celery, cut small           |   |
| 2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice       |   |

Soak the gelatine in cold water five minutes; add vinegar, lemon juice, boiling water, sugar and salt; stir until dissolved. Strain and when beginning to set add remaining ingredients. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water and chill. Serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise dressing, or cut in dice and serve in cases made of red or green peppers; or the mixture may be shaped in molds lined with pimentoes.

In my recipes no special molds are required;—any vegetable, china or glass dish will mold them nicely.

NOTE: Use fruits instead of vegetables in the above recipe and you have a delicious fruit salad.

SNOW PUDDING

- |                                      |                                   |
|--------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| 1/2 envelope KNOX Sparkling Gelatine | 3/4 cup sugar or 3/4 cup of syrup |
| 1/4 cup cold water                   | 1/4 cup lemon juice               |
| 1 cup boiling water                  | Whites of 2 eggs                  |

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes, dissolve in boiling water and add sugar, lemon juice and grated rind of one lemon; strain and set aside; occasionally stir mixture, and when quite thick beat with wire spoon or whisk until frothy; add whites of eggs beaten stiff, and continue beating until stiff enough to hold its shape. Pile by spoonfuls on glass dish or put in mold. Chill and serve with boiled custard.

NOTE: When syrup is used in these recipes in place of sugar omit 1/4 cupful of boiling water from the quantity given in the recipe.

WHAT "4 to 1" MEANS

My gelatine is preferred by home-makers because of its economy. One package of Knox Sparkling Gelatine will serve a family of six with four different salads or desserts for four luncheons or dinners, while the ready-prepared packages will do for only one meal. That is why experts have been calling Knox the "4 to 1" Gelatine—it lasts four times as long, goes four times as far, and serves four times as many people as the ready prepared packages.

Special Home Service

There are many other ideas and "dishes that men like" and women, too, in my recipe books "Dainty Desserts" and "Food Economy." Send for them, enclosing a 2c stamp, and mention your grocer's name.

Basswood, Belmont, Birtle, Darlingford, Crandall, Coulter, Dauphin, Edrans, Foxwarren, Holland, Kenton, Hamiota, Lundar, Lenore, La Riviere, Neepawa, Pipestone, Roland, Selkirk, Sifton, Oak Bluff helped with the work of the Boys' and Girls' Clubs.

Deloraine, Durban, Beresford, Basswood and Edrans have endeavored to help in providing some form of community amusement, such as the building of a rink.

Ellenville, Birtle and Minnedosa have assisted the local hospital.

Dauphin, Darlingford, Dominion City, Elkhorn, Morris, Medora and Reston have improved the local cemeteries.

Austin, Benito, Kenton, Lyleton, Selkirk and Valley River have assisted with some other form of local improvement.

Burnside, Crandall, Coulter, Deloraine, Ellenville, Lenore, Graysville, Petersfield and Moore Park have helped to serve hot lunches to the school children who are unable to eat the noon meal at home.

The following societies have either secured a district nurse or are actively endeavoring to do so: Deloraine, Belmont, Arizona, Benito, Basswood, Charleswood, Delta, Dauphin, Elkhorn, Medora, Minnedosa, Neepawa, Pilot Mound, Roblin and Virden.

Pilot Mound, Souris, Burnside and Deloraine have sent help to the teachers of New Canadian schools.

During the year, twelve very successful and inspiring district conventions were held, in spite of the difficulties caused by the strike.

NEWS NOTES FROM THE MANITOBA WOMEN'S INSTITUTES

The Belmont Women's Institute is making an earnest effort to secure the services of a district nurse. They served a lunch, which contributed very materially to the success of the Seed Grain Fair. They have donated $25.00 to the Children's Home, but are not neglecting the needy in their own locality.

Birtle raised over $600.00 since January 1st, which has cleared the local hospital of debt.

The January meeting of the Brandon Institute was particularly interesting. Hon. Dr. Thornton, Minister of Education, gave a very fine address on the "New Canadian." He offered many valuable suggestions as to ways in which the women of this province may help to solve this important problem.

The Decker Institute has purchased a piano, and paid for electric wiring for the fine new Memorial Community Hall, recently elected in the village.

The Dugald Institute sent a bale of clothing and $25.00 to a destitute family in the drought-stricken area in Saskatchewan.

Ellenville Institute has been busy doing necessary sewing for the Hamiota Hospital.

The women of Isabella feel that one of the duties of mothers is to provide wholesome amusement for the young people. So, during the coming summer, they will build a curling and skating rink, to be ready next fall.

The Killarney ladies are making a special effort to make the war brides feel at home in the community.

The McAuley Institute sent clothing and money to Saskatchewan.

The Neepawa Institute is endeavoring to further the development of music in their town.

The Women's Institute of Plum Coulee is making garments for the Children's Aid of Winnipeg.

The Rockwood Institute sent $10.00 to the Children's Aid, and also assisted some needy persons at home.

The Virden Institute is co-operating with a former secretary of their Institute, Mrs. Burge, who is now teaching in one of the New Canadian schools, "Vimy Ridge," up in the Duck Mountain region, north of Ethelbert. They have raised money to procure a coal-oil stove for hot lunches; have sent large framed pictures of the King and Queen, several sacks of clothing, shoes and stockings, thus enabling many children to attend who otherwise would have been unable to do so. They donated $10.00 toward purchasing a piano for the G.W.V. Club Room, and $10.00 to the Virden Collegiate Literary Society, to help promote a fund for elocutionary contests among advanced pupils. Several sacks of clothing and shoes were sent to poor families in the Ste. Rose district.

ONTARIO REPORTS.

A Story Hour at Meaford.

Not so very long ago the Women's Institutes at Meaford presented the Public Library Board with $250 and the Board expressed their appreciation by appointing two members of the Women's Institute as members of the Library Board for 1920, giving them charge of selecting books for girls and juveniles, so the ladies have started a Children's Story Hour each Saturday afternoon from two to three o'clock. The teachers of the public school and some of the Women's Institute members are assisting with this story hour and the children are delighted.

A COMMUNITY INSTITUTE.

The following clipping which has been taken from a local newspaper, tells some interesting news about the Clarkson Institute.

Tangible evidence of the efforts of the Women's Institute members of Clarkson on behalf of their community are to be found in the hot school lunch which has been served to the school children since the beginning of February, and the lending library opened in a room above one of the main stores, just before the beginning of the year.

Between thirty and forty children, many of whom have come miles to school, have been daily benefited by the hot soup or cocoa prepared by the supervisor engaged by the Institute branch, who remains during the noon recess.

While the Institute was responsible for the first steps taken towards its establishment, the library has been taken over by the municipality, members of the Women's organization, however, giving help from time to time with the distribution of the books.

A NEIGHBORLY INSTITUTE.

A report which comes from the Dundas Institute, says:

"At the last meeting of the Dundas Women's Institute, it was decided to make an effort to get in touch with anyone wishing domestic employment of any kind, as well as sewing, mending, etc., or to help where there is sickness. Also those with spare time who would be willing to relieve a mother for an afternoon or evening, not necessarily to work, but to take charge and be responsible. There will be a register at the Public Library, where those needing assistance and those who can give assistance, may call and register. No fee will be charged."

A Note of Appreciation from Timiskaming.

Mrs. H. Willet, Cochrane, who has been doing district nursing in Timiskaming under the auspices of the Women's Institute Branch writes as follows under date of March 10th. The letter which she encloses, a copy of which is given, will be read with pleasure by any of the Institutes who forwarded clothing to the Timiskaming District during the winter:

I have been busy for the past three weeks in superintending an Emergency Hospital for the Influenza Epidemic in Cochrane, but we were able to close down a few days ago.

There has been a good deal of sickness among the settlers, we have had calls almost every day to visit homes where it is almost impossible to get a doctor, and the women do appreciate the advice and help given them by the Department.

I enclose a letter from a settler, who received a bale of the clothing sent to Miss Higgins from a Southern Ontario Institute Branch. We had a little girl from this home operated on for diseased tonsils and adenoids, and were able to arrange for free hospital treatment and surgery. I send on the letter as a sample of a number of similar ones we have received. (The letter follows:)

"I am writing you a few lines to tell you how pleased I was for all the good clothing you sent me. It will save me a lot of buying. With such a lot of children it requires more than we can buy when there is just the one to earn money for the lot. I must thank you most heartily for that great gift. The little girl's operation was successful and she is improving every day."

The Shelburne Council appreciates the value of a rest room and at the request of the Women's Institutes, has renovated the room used for the purpose.

Stoney Creek Institute made a grant to the Public School for Manual Training and Domestic Science.

The members of the Newmarket Institute spent a happy evening with their husbands and friends recently. A very interesting programme was arranged by the gentlemen.

The Kent Bridge Branch held a successful entertainment, the proceeds of which went to the Armenian Fund. This amount, with a previous offering, makes a gift of $90 for the fund from this branch.

A rest room has recently been established by the Institute at Grimsby, to be open two days a week for the convenience of the ladies of the surrounding community.

At the March meeting of the Galt Institute, plans were made to contribute to the diet kitchen, which is to be presented to the hospital by the surrounding Institutes. The Galt Branch is also planning to hold a street fair. At the roll call, at a recent meeting, each member present responded with a dollar, which she had been asked to earn, and told how it had been earned.

The Women's Institute at Maynard is planning the erection of a Soldiers' Memorial in the local cemetery.

The Devlin Branch will offer a special prize for the best collection of canned vegetables at the Emo fall fair.

CLAVET, SASKATCHEWAN, SENDS GOOD REPORT.

The display of crocheting and embroidery, home baking and canning attracted much attention at the joint meeting of the Clavet Homemakers' Club and the Grain Growers on the occasion of their annual Seed Fair.

Prizes were awarded to the different entries, as well as to the school children for the best work in their classes. The pupils furnished a concert, a novel feature of which was the awarding of prizes for the best platform work.

QUEBEC HOMEMAKERS' CLUBS NOTES.

Reports from the Quebec Homemakers' Clubs show that their members are carrying on their programmes with their usual enthusiasm.

Howick Club held its annual business meeting in March and decided that, as their members were scattered over a considerable extent of territory, it would help the work to have a head for each locality. As a result, five vice-presidents were elected for the ensuing year. The Club is especially interested in the improvement of schools, and voted to again assist with the annual school fair. Papers on "Beautifying the Home" and "Child Welfare" were read and discussed.

Orford Club has been interested for some time in supplying milk at the Central School, where a small milk-distributing station is being successfully operated. Plans for a sugar party were discussed and arranged.

Bury Club at a recent meeting voted a second sum of $25.00 to the local School Board for improving school grounds, and also appointed a committee to canvass for a cemetery fund for the general upkeep of the cemetery.

Lennoxville Club co-operated with the Farmers' Club of that district in can't argue—at least he never does."

"That's it," said mother placidly. "Have you never noticed how convincing that kind of person is?"

I had not noticed it, and said so. "Besides," I added, "no amount of argument could convince Henrietta since she is already convinced. No, mother, I'm afraid the real reason is more personal."

"Personal?" Mother looked up from her knitting in a puzzled way.

"I don't wish to worry you, dear," I said, "but I'm afraid that Henrietta does not like Uncle Jack. In fact, I'm beginning to fear that she dislikes him very much."

Mother looked so surprised that it was easy to see she had never thought of that.

"She does her best to hide it, of course," I explained. "But more than once I have noticed that she does not run into his society and seems silent and unlike herself when he joins us. Only the other day we were going for a walk when he caught up to us and suddenly she discovered that she hadn't time to walk but must go right back to St. Hilliar's. Not that it did her any good, owing to Uncle Jack's thick-headedness. He simply turned around and walked back with her."

"What day was that?" asked mother thoughtfully.

"Last Tuesday."

"Ah—yes. That was the day Jack was so late for tea. His appetite was poor too."

"Serves him right!" I declared. "No doubt Henrietta had to snub him severely. He simply can't see when he isn't wanted."

Mother picked up her sock again.

"Just let them alone, Lina," said she, in her placid way. "Don't worry."

But how can I help worrying? For if Henrietta simply can't stand Uncle Jack—he will have to go. His eyes are almost better now anyway.

A WEEK later.

I hate to bother mother again, but I'll have to, if this goes on. There is no sign of Uncle Jack returning to Toronto yet. And if he cannot see the advisability of such a step it is time someone suggested it to him. Mother won't want to do it, I'm afraid. She is absurdly fond of Uncle Jack, just because he is her brother. I like him myself, although I get impatient with his stupidity. But I can't have Henrietta upset in this way.

I think he ought to consider Henrietta first.

The trouble is that mother may be prejudiced by her family tie and her somewhat restricted viewpoint. Fond as she is of Henrietta, she does not get her in quite the right perspective. She does not seem quite to understand what an important person she is, how outstanding, how absolutely unique! Henrietta would be impossible to replace. There are dozens and hundreds of men like Uncle Jack, but only one woman like Henrietta. All our set agree about this. Except Katherine Ripley. I feel quite sad about Katherine. She seems to have no serious inner nature. She is all froth. She calls our pioneer women "Silly old frumps," because they have little time or thought for changing fashions. And then, just to show her inconsistency, she criticizes Henrietta because she always dresses so smartly and wears such dinky hats.

"What on earth do you want her to do?" I asked in exasperation.

"I want her to hurry up and make her selection and give some of the rest of us a chance!" said Katherine.

"Hats?" I asked.

"Men," said Katherine.

I walked away and left her. She is really too silly. Why anyone can see that Henrietta never looks at a man—except in politeness. Being a lady she can't turn her back on every male person who speaks to her.

For my own part I think that if men like to talk to her it is a hopeful sign—men must be educated as well as women. They are frightfully benighted. Every woman should help a little. Harold-next-door is home. I have been thinking that I might begin with him. It will be an awful bore, but I am no shirker.

I WAS interrupted here by Harold calling up to the window and wanting to know when I could go canoeing. I remembered my duty to the cause and said I would go tomorrow.

But what I set out to say was that Henrietta's distaste for Uncle Jack's society is growing. She seldom comes to our house now. Even my assurance that I will never leave her alone with him for five minutes has had no effect. She finds some excuse nearly every time I ask her down.

And, in spite of this pointed avoidance, Uncle Jack continues to force his company upon her. He meets her when she goes for walks. He calls upon her at St. Hilliar's. The girls notice it. I have seen them giggle. It must cause Henrietta acute discomfort. She is so sensitive. If it goes on I shan't be surprised if she were suddenly to leave town.

But I am determined—if one of them has to go, it will not be Henrietta. I fear that speaking to mother will be of no use. If necessary, I must appeal to Uncle Jack himself. I am sure that he has the instincts of a gentleman.

TWO days later.

I have been educating Harold. It's rather fun. Not half so boring as I feared. It's easier too. Harold has quite a good head. He agrees with almost everything I say. When I explained to him how wretchedly women have been treated all down the ages, citing some special instances, he got quite excited and declared that the men who had done things like that were "horrid cads" and "mean old geezers." He agrees with me that woman is man's equal and much more. In fact he thinks women are "the whole cheese." It's slang, I know, but the meaning is clear.

I went for the canoe ride as I had promised and we had a perfectly lovely time. I mean it was very helpful. We did not talk about woman exclusively because I had already said almost all that is really important. It does not take long unless someone is stupid enough to contradict. Harold was very reasonable, only I almost wished he wouldn't say "what you say goes" with quite so much stress on the pronoun.

I shall tell Henrietta about it, and especially I shall prove to her how wrong she was about marriage being an embarrassing topic between friends. I explained my views quite frankly to Harold, and if anyone was embarrassed it was not I.

I dealt with the subject largely from the economic standpoint. "Harold," I said, "when you marry do you expect a wife or a housekeeper?"

He got so red and looked so silly that I answered for him. "Of course you'll say you want a wife—they all do. But let me ask you a question—Who is going to keep house?"

He murmured something about, "Perhaps mother would!" Such an absurdity! It just shows how men continually miss the point of an argument.

"You see," I explained to him as kindly as I could, "your wife has to be your housekeeper. Now the thing to do is to acknowledge this fact and put the matter on a business basis. A wife doesn't draw a salary, a housekeeper does. By recognizing this simple fact the wife becomes self-supporting—and one of the most fertile causes of friction in the home is tactfully removed."

Harold fanned himself with his cap. He looked puzzled.

"But," he said, "most fellows give their wives everything anyway."

"In other words, they do not give her anything at all. Surely that is plain?"

Plain as it was, Harold couldn't see it, so I put it another way. "The whole thing is in the principle," I insisted, "and the principle is division. So much for the wife as an independent individual. So much for the husband on the same basis."

"But who pays the bills?" asked Harold, thoughtfully.

"Don't be stupid! There must also be a house appropriation independent of each."

He looked terribly downcast at this. "Can't be done, Lina," he said. "The oof wouldn't stretch."

I was still patient.

"There will be exactly the same amount of oof, as you call it, as under the old system. For of course the wife wouldn't want to stick her share in a bank, and naturally the husband would put his share where it was most needed. He would probably leave the placing of it to his wife."

Forty—the Dangerous Age for Men

IT is then that the dread Pyorrhea is most likely to get established in the mouth. It is then that long-continued dental neglect tells.

Pyorrhea—which afflicts four out of five people over forty—begins with nothing more alarming than tender and bleeding gums. But as this insidious disease progresses, the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fallout, or must be extracted to free the system of the poisonous Pyorrhea germs that lodge in little pockets around them.

It is to the infection of these deadly germs that medical science has traced many of the ills of middle age—weakened vital organs, nervous disorders, rheumatism, anaemia, and other serious ailments.

End your Pyorrhea troubles before they begin. See your dentist often for tooth and gum inspection, and start using Forhan's For the Gums today.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress, if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices will not do this. Forhan's keeps the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

no opportunity to hear it. So also lecturers and other entertainers have come to make the evening around the camp fire a joy to be remembered forever.

Some of the Streets of Paradise.

THERE are over one hundred and fifty miles of fine trails used for fire protection in the park. Other pedestrian trails have been developed. In order to keep the children from the main highways and that their walks be not the aimless ones so common to city children, trails have been marked with unobtrusive signs indicating in simple language the natural history resources of the trail. Experienced leaders take groups of children over these trails, indicate the types of trees, identify birds, their habits, nesting places, songs, etc.; climb to dizzying heights, and gaze with their little sad eyes on beauties never before seen and never to be forgotten. The physical invigoration, the spiritual exaltation all leave on the child who has never before known these things an impression which stirs the sluggish ambitions out of the rut of their uninspiring and barren city wretchedness.

Others Live in Paradise.

OF course it is not only the orphan or the crippled child or those who come from homes of poverty who live in the camps. There is a large and increasing number of people who are self-supporting, self-respecting citizens whose budgets make it impossible for them to enjoy the inspiring and invigorating summer in the woods and for those who have little or no opportunity in this way to commune with nature, the commission has with the aid of various organizations, such as social settlements, the Y.W.C.A., etc., established camps where for a moderate sum of money, five or six dollars a week, a working girl may come and have all that is sold for twenty-five or thirty-five dollars per week in a commercial girls' camp.

In the same way a daily population of 1,600 boy scouts attests to the call that the woods make to boy life. All the mysteries of the lake and the woods, the character developing, self-reliant programme gives in this indirect way to the State, a healthier boy who as a citizen is better fitted to meet the increasingly trying demands of citizenship.

Fires of Paradise.

IT is always difficult to picture adequately what our little waif feels when he is whisked as though he were on the proverbial magic carpet from the sordid environment of the city streets to the exalting contact of the glorious outdoor. It is here that life companionships are formed, and the impressionistic mind of the child receives attitudes, ideas and impressions which will always stay with him. The kindly leader has as his sole aim the happiness of the child and in his loving care may safely be entrusted the destiny of the child for the brief period he is here.

A Thought For Canadians.

THE interesting thing about this whole development is that you and I, as citizens of the Province, might be stockholders in such an enterprise. All of the wonderful possibilities as revealed in the development described in this article, or at least a major portion of them, can be worked out. It is not necessary that a park of the size of the Palisades Park be secured for such a project. There are ample opportunities in Canadian parks to work out some of the principles which have resulted in such a wide public service. Among these may be noted:

- (1) That it is desirable that such developments be within a reasonable distance of communities.
- (2) That the transportation charge be within the reach of the poor.
- (3) That no concessions be granted to private individuals or corporations to operate the facilities intended to aid the public in the enjoyment of its park. These facilities, such as restaurants, boats, transportation, etc., should be operated by the authorities, in order to remove the private motive.

"Oh," said Harold, "I see now. Say Lina, what a little old company promoter was lost when they gave you long hair! Same old proposition, but you make it sound like the minute before last."

"It's not the same," I protested. "The principle is entirely different." Yet do what I could, I could not succeed in making him see the great, the essential difference. Yet there are those who contend that man's mind is more logical than woman's!

A WEEK later.

I have spoken to Uncle Jack. My idea of going to him instead of to mother was a wise one I think.

"Getting fed up with the poor blind uncle, are you, Lina?" he asked—although I had been very careful to begin simply by saying how glad I was that his eyes were quite better and that he would soon be at work again.

I thought it best to be quite frank. "I am not at all 'fed up' with you, Uncle Jack," I said, "and perhaps other people would have better appetite for your company if you did not give them so much of it."

Uncle Jack whistled. But I went right on. "People do not like to be simply followed about all the time."

"You surprise me!" said Uncle Jack. "What people do I so simply follow, and where do we go?"

I decided to be franker still.

"You refuse to leave Henrietta alone."

"On the contrary, I could refuse Henrietta nothing."

"Don't try to be smart. And be careful how you call her Henrietta. She might hear you. Uncle Jack, I am in earnest. This can't go on. It's got to stop."

"Tut, tut, child! Don't be redundant."

For the moment I could not think what redundant meant, but I wasn't going to let him confuse the issue.

"If you don't go, she will," I told him bluntly.

This seemed to startle him.

"Really?" he said, but his voice was not as careless as he tried to make it. "Look here, Niece Lina," he went on, "do you say honestly, plainly and without malicious intent, that you believe this state of things to be the case?"

I nodded.

"You are convinced that Henri— that Miss Robson finds my continued presence in this town distasteful? That she—that she doesn't—er—like me?"

It sounded as if he were really surprised at the possibility.

"I should think you could see it for yourself, Uncle Jack."

He was silent for a moment, and then "Bad eyes, you know! Yet, as you say, I ought to have seen it if it's there to see. I don't pretend to understand women—still there should be an instinct, or something. Lina, I will admit you worry me."

I said I had spoken only for his good.

"Certainly, certainly—that's always understood. But I'd like to know on what you base your assertions? Has Miss Robson ever intimated anything of this kind to you?"

"Certainly not; we do not discuss you."

"Then how do you know?"

"By instinct, as you say yourself."

He looked at me in that considering manner which I cannot say I quite enjoy.

"How old are you, Lina?" he asked. "Nineteen, isn't it?"

Then for some unknown reason he looked more cheerful.

"My age has nothing whatever to do with it, and I refuse to be silenced in that way. Something has got to be done!"

"Right!" cried Uncle Jack, so suddenly and so loudly that I jumped. "Something must be done and at once. Wish me luck, Niece Lina, for I go to do it."

Poor Uncle Jack! Well, I tried to save him!

But Henrietta will not be harsh. She is not likely to forget that he is my uncle!

TWO days later.

I have tried to write the end of this episode several times.

Then I decided not to write it at all.

Then I felt that I must write it, if only as a discipline—and as a warning to myself in later years, lest I should ever again be tempted to believe in woman!

But I will spare myself. I will write it in as few words as possible.

Henrietta Robson and Uncle Jack are engaged!

I had brought Katherine Ripley home to tea and as we passed the door of the summer house we saw them.

He was holding her hand.

The shock was so great I hardly took it in.

"He is holding her hand," I said in a dull voice to Katherine.

"He has been doing lots more than that!" said Katherine in a gurgling whisper. "Look at her hair."

I looked at her hair. It was coming down. There was a little curl loose over her right ear.

"S-shish!" whispered Katherine, pinching me. "He's going to do it again."

And then, while we stood there paralyzed, too stunned to move—he kissed her!

Katherine sighed.

"It's rather nice, isn't it?" she said. "Here, let's get out."

We got back to the house somehow—I don't know how.

"I knew she'd take him," said Katherine. "He's really quite a good match, you know, and he has a certain air. You'll be bridesmaid, Lina, and your frock ought to run to something quite swell. There'll be the bridesmaid's gift too—see that you make him choose it early while he's too happy to think. I'd wear green if I were you—Nile green. It looks so cool, and you can stand it all right if you wear enough powder. Aren't you sorry you've let yourself get so tanned?"

She said a great deal more. I don't remember it. I was lost in the bitterness of my disillusion. But I may say right here that I do not need powder in order to wear Nile green and I am not tanned—at least only enough to be rather fetching. When Katherine Ripley tans she looks like an Indian.

"Here they come. Let's throw rice at them!" said Katherine. And she ran off to ask mother for the rice.

I went upstairs to my room.

Presently mother came up after me. She pretended that she came for some hairpins: mother is so transparent.

"You mustn't be jealous, Lina," she said. "Can you lend me a bone hairpin?"

I answered very coldly and in a surprised tone. "Jealous? Of whom? There are bone hairpins on the pin tray."

"Henrietta will be fonder of you than ever now," said mother, picking up a nail file instead of the hairpin. "And you can be with her all you like presently, when she is one of the family."

"I have no desire," I said, "to be with anyone at any time, nor to belong to any family which includes the person you mention."

"But Lina—my dear, I thought you were so devoted—"

"The woman to whom I was devoted does not—never did—exist."

"But Lina—your own uncle!"

Mother, you see, never keeps to a subject. We were not discussing my own uncle.

"The woman whom I admired," I went on bitterly, but with great restraint, "was too high principled to enter anyone's family or to have anything to do with anyone's uncle. The woman I revered was devoted, body and soul, to the cause of womankind. She was a woman who stood ready to give all, to risk all, to sacrifice all for the one great thing—the fulfilling of her womanhood's glorious destiny."

Mother stuck the nail-file absently into her hair.

"But Lina," she said in her slow way, "isn't that just exactly what your Henrietta has done?"

Dear mother! she is perfect—but so old-fashioned!

As for Henrietta Robson—I would pity her if I didn't pity Uncle Jack more!

The Puzzle for May

By TOM WOOD.

The Other Half of "The Dominion Necklace."

Each bead or disc represents a town or city between Ottawa and the Atlantic.

The two half-discs picture two sweet-scented little "flowers of May" which are well known in the Lower Provinces. Can you give us their names?

Remember, the illustrations follow sound more than correct spelling.

Note (xx): The dots in this disc represent the five vowels, though not in alphabetical order. The numbers stand for corresponding letters of the alphabet. Placed together, they spell a town in New Brunswick.

Two prizes will be given—first, one dollar and fifty cents, and second, one dollar—for the best solutions, judged according to neatness and accuracy.

All are eligible to compete. Answers must be received by May 20th to be included.

(4) While it is desirable to have certain facilities free for the use of the public, it is a good principle to charge a moderate sum for such use, which, if possible, should be large enough to make the service entirely self-supporting.

(5) Ample opportunity should be afforded to "hikers" through the laying out of trails, which incidentally serve as fire trails.

(6) Restaurants and refreshment stations should be established to provide simple, but wholesome and nourishing, foods at low cost.

(7) Standard types of simple camps might be constructed on lakes where the sanitary provisions insure safety, which should be rented to social organizations, such as nurseries, orphan asylums, social settlements, etc., where at moderate cost, those who have little or no opportunity for a wholesome vacation can be accommodated.

The Yields of Paradise.

If you could only see the sparkle in the sad eyes of the orphan, or the smile that plays around the drooped mouth of some little child who has been deprived of the normal use of his limbs; if you could see the warmth which comes into the heart of the little child who for the first time disports in those heavenly fields or feel the stir of imagination and exaltation which comes to the tired working girl as she sits restfully beneath a tree enjoying her respite from drear and deadly monotony of the shop—then you would feel that membership in this corporation was a privilege and an honor. It is not only that it yields a dividend of satisfaction that your State is doing a unique thing with its beneficent efforts but that your State is safer in the hands of children whose health is being protected, whose vision is not distorted and who look back at what was done for them under the auspices of the State with satisfaction and appreciation.

Indicates that they have rooted well, yet always admit a little air at times to prevent damping off. Shade them, too, for a hot sun will soon kill them outright. A frame with a mild bottom heat is most desirable to get the plants to "take" quickly, but they can quite well be rooted in an ordinary frame in a warm, sheltered position. When young Dahlias become root-bound, those minute insects known as thrips will soon appear, and the unhealthy appearance of the plants indicates that something must be done immediately. Try to secure thorough eradication of the pests before the plants are planted out, by syringing with insecticide every two days, and shortly after with tepid water. Now this is very essential, for if the thrips do not disappear before the Dahlias are planted out, they will give continuous trouble throughout the season, and this is the principal cause of the failure of one of our most pleasing flowers.

A few years ago we thought that the beautiful Carnations could not be grown with success in the garden, and that they were distinctly hot house flowers, but some three years ago, I procured some seedlings to try out, and they gave such good results that I am more than pleased and have the same plants to-day. Perhaps a few points on the handling of them would not be amiss. Few flowers are more beautiful or sweeter than Carnations and by giving them a reasonable amount of care and attention, it is not a difficult matter to obtain fine flowers from plants in the open ground. Carnations thrive best where plenty of light, air and sunshine are available; they are very averse to a damp situation and cold, drying winds. At this period of the year, a top dressing is a great help to the plants. Previous to applying it, all dead leaves should be removed, and the surface of the soil well stirred. Another matter which must not be neglected is staking the plants as soon as the flower stems commence to push up. Syringing the plants once a week with soft

Craftsman Fabrikoid The Choice of this Furniture Maker

"The cheap split leather ought to be entirely eliminated in upholstering furniture," says S. Karpen, a leading furniture manufacturer in the States.

CAST aside the cow. There are many things in which man can improve over nature, and one is the making of a covering for furniture. Mr. Karpen learned this from experience in the line in which he is a specialist. For upholstery Fabrikoid looks better, is more sanitary, and, above all, does not deteriorate or absorb water or grease. The life of Fabrikoid is practically interminable—it outlasts the furniture itself in many cases. This is proof of its economy.

The best you can get in leather upholstery is most likely "split" leather—uneven in thickness, irregular in texture, full of soft spongy spots, or hard brittle ones that crack. Craftsman Fabrikoid is pliable, even, richly colored, dyed if you wish, and without waste.

When buying new furniture, or having the old recovered, insist on Craftsman Fabrikoid. Your dealer can supply it, and the appearance and the saving will surprise you. Our free booklet "Fabrikoid in the Home" will give you a few hints about many things that can be done about the home with Fabrikoid. Write today for a copy.

production—and it is seen in happy application in the attitude of the supervisor and her assistants towards those who are under her care. There are twenty-one workers, at present, in this department, and there are others anxious to come. Everything, except cutting out and shipment is undertaken by the blind workers in connection with the manufactures. On March 8th, ten of these workers were placed on the pay-roll, seven on piece work, three on flat. The payment of apprentices is nine dollars a week; and, of course, the pay-roll is the ambition of all workers.

THE Prevention of Blindness campaign is one in which every woman should be interested, inasmuch as it means the saving of the eyesight of the infant and the safeguarding of that of the small citizen with defective vision. More than thirty per cent. of blindness is preventable—and, when we consider this fact, we wonder that society has been so slothful in recognizing its duty towards the helpless ones. In the case of ophthalmia neonatorum, a few drops of nitrate of silver applied to the baby's eyes in the first hours of its existence will obviate this affliction. The increased care of public health in our cities has meant the saving of sight for many little citizens. Boston has made an enviable record in this matter, her care with regard to the newborn children being such that ophthalmia neonatorum has practically disappeared.

The C.N.I.B. has issued several folders with its monthly bulletins which have urged upon the public the necessity for saving the baby's eyes and also for protecting the sight of those children who are below normal in this respect. This Institute, also, strongly advocated the gathering of data indicative of the extent of the problem of defective vision in Toronto schools, as there was an impression that myopia classes, as provided for under the Ontario Auxiliary Classes Act of April, 1914, were sadly needed. The report shows the thoroughness with which the committee, consisting of Dr. Helen MacMurchy, Miss Kerr, Miss Dyke, Miss Emery, Miss Foy, Dr. Whyte, Mr. Mills, Miss Ewing, reviewed the situation. The careless retention of a child in a class to which his eyesight is not equal is, we hope, a practice of the past—and the auxiliary classes should look after such young pupils as demand special consideration. The case of those who are too young to help themselves or to safeguard their powers is of unusual appeal. Their safety is in the hands of others and those who wish to preserve for them all that world of color and beauty which eyesight means should act with promptness if the saving is to be effective.

THERE is a comfortable home at 78 College Street, Toronto, the Women's Residence, which was opened in October, 1919, and to which the name of "Clarkewood" was given, in honor of Mrs. Lionel Clarke, the wife of His Honor, the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, whose work in connection with the early organization, the Canadian Women's Association for the Welfare of the Blind, and whose present efforts show the sincerity and depth of her interest. Mrs. W. A. H. Kerr and Mrs. Leach, also were prominent officials in this first organization, which was, naturally interested in the activities for blind soldiers, and it is of interest to recall that the first activity on behalf of the individual blind persons, inaugurated by the Institute two years ago was the furnishing of instruction in Braille and light vocational lines for a small group of blinded Canadian soldiers at the Library for the Blind.

The Women's Auxiliary of the C.N.I.B. now has a membership of over four hundred, with Mrs. Lionel Clarke as president. Mrs. Frank Hodgins and Mrs. D. B. Macdonald are vice-presidents, Mrs. J. C. Breckenridge is hon. treasurer and Miss Mabel Cory, hon. secretary. Mrs. C. W. Beatty, Mrs. Campbell Reaves, Mrs. James Scott and Miss Baldwin form the house committee for "Clarkewood";—Mrs. Clarke, Mrs. Bruce Macdonald and Mrs. W. R. Riddell look after the domestic arrangements for Pearson Hall. "Clarkewood" provides board and lodging for certain workers in the Industrial Department for Women and members of the staff in the Head Office, at the rate of $5.50 a week—which is a remarkably low figure when one considers the present prices of bread, milk and butter—to say nothing of eggs. "Clarkewood" also supplies the luncheon which the workers enjoy at the noon hour down town—so, the immediate needs of the women workers are looked after in a thorough fashion. Such is the appreciation of the quarters known as the Women's Residence, where Mrs. Briers and Mrs. MacLean are in management, that there is already a waiting list and developments of this residential plan may be expected. It is true that the blind residents cannot see the comfort of the spacious, well-furnished living-room and the cosy bedrooms; but they can realize the "homelikeness" of their environment and are happy in its cosy seclusion. This residence was furnished by the members of the Women's Auxiliary, who are responsible for its maintenance.

The Salesroom Department, which is also housed at 40 Adelaide St., West, is really under the After Care Department, and its activities consist largely in marketing the wares manufactured by the blind. There is a sale of products here, both from the C.N.I.B. shops and from home workers. During the month of March, there were Tuesday morning sales, which revealed the extent and variety of the manufactures. Some time ago, a committee consisting of Mrs. Graeme Adam, representing the Women's Auxiliary of the Institute, Miss Davis, the Field Worker, Mrs. Ridge, the supervisor at the I.D.W., and the Director, Mr. C. W. Holmes, was formed, to take charge of and work out the details for this department. The sales-room carries certain staple lines of material needed by the blind in home work, such as reed, cane, wool, cotton yarns, cotton cloth, etc. These materials are purchased at the best wholesale prices and sold in small retail quantities at exactly the same rate, thereby giving the home workers the advantage of the Institute's purchasing power, without the investment of their capital. Then there is the advantage that the production of these workers, so long as it is up to saleable standard is being bought for cash (sent within thirty days), the price paid being the highest which the committee finds can be obtained at retail. This secures a market for the home worker, who receives his money with the minimum of waiting.

Many women's organizations have interested themselves in this work. The Women's Institutes of Peel County, for instance, gave a piano to the Library, and the Toronto Women Teachers' Association have contributed liberally to the equipment of the same department, while the Chateaugay Chapter, I.O.D.E. furnished the reception room.

Mr. C. W. Holmes, the director of the C.N.I.B. is a Canadian by birth who became blind at the age of ten, and who continued his education, holding the position for eleven years as Head Master of the Eastern Townships College of Music, before going to the United States where he spent some years with the Massachusetts Commission for the Blind. From the head office to the broom shops, you will find an atmosphere of cheerful activity—and you will find it worth while, as a good citizen, to acquaint yourself with the work of the C.N.I.B.

THE VIOLET

With all its simplicity, the violet is a subtle flower. Its way of guarding honey sap, yet at the same time inviting winged visitors, shows both caution and boldness. After it has flowered and all attention to its beautiful life is over, way down below its leaves, far out of sight, it produces clear, half-formed flowers without perfume, honey or petals, but each one bearing stamens and seed germs, which somehow develop the seed from which the new plant arises. When the seed capsules are ripe they split into three parts, shooting the seeds far into the air, much as little birds are pushed forcefully from the nest and made to fly far from home, that the circle of beauty may be forever widened.

Use A Handy Reliable Flashlight

SAVE time. Save steps. Save work. Use a handy Reliable Flashlight to hunt your engine troubles or to give you light to do those hundreds of little chores.

Reliable Flashlights put a brilliant and safe light always at your command. You can get as long as 12 hours constant service, and 16 hours intermittent service by using the large Reliable Flashlight Battery—best for your light case whether Flashlight or Daylo.

The "Big Brass Cap" on the Reliable No. 6 Battery drains the battery of all power—puts every spark to work. No wasted energy when used on engine, bell or for any purpose where a longer lasting battery is necessary. Should you ask your dealer for it, the "Fahnestock Spring Clip Binding Post" will be put on your Reliable Battery.

Reliable ignition units do not have to be "charged" like storage batteries. Always ready for use—whether engine or tractor.

water and salt, a teaspoonful of salt to a gallon of water, will be found very beneficial. Disbudding or thinning the buds must not be neglected, if you want fine blooms, as the majority of plants produce considerably more buds than they can properly develop. In thinning the buds, the strength of the plant should be considered, but generally speaking, from three to five buds to a stem may be allowed except when exhibition blooms are required, in which case only one bud to a stem must be permitted. Exhibition blooms must be protected from rain and sun just as the flowers begin to expand. Unfortunately Carnations are liable to be attacked by several troublesome pests; during hot weather, greenfly often makes its appearance. Syringe with soft soap water, or nicotine to destroy this pest.

STUDY your catalogues for a continuity of bloom in the garden, not forgetting that you can have lilies in bloom the whole season long if you get the different varieties, but where most mistakes are made in handling lilies, is in the planting. In the first place lilies are like roses, they do not like wet feet, so arrange to plant the lilies in depth according to size of bulb. Take a 10-inch circumference bulb for instance, it needs to be at least 9 inches deep, with two inches of pure sand under it. Cover with sand to an inch above the point of bulb, then fill in the whole with the ordinary garden soil, firming the whole down well, as lilies prefer a rather hard soil to force themselves through.

Get a few of the following kinds, and I am sure that at the end of the season you will be well repaid: Tenuifolium or Scarlet Turk's Cap, Candidum or Madonna Lily, Croceum or Belfast Orange Lily, Henrii, the hardiest garden lily, and one of the best, Testacium, one of the best whites, Auratum Platyphylum and Vitatum and wind up with the Speciosums Roseum, Album and Rubrum. If these do not give you good satisfaction you must be very hard to suit.

Do not let us forget the Gladiolus this year, for anyone can grow Gladiolus successfully, and they lend themselves to any decorative color scheme; owing to their great range of colors and shades, they are to my mind much better in clumps of six or eight than in the old orthodox straight rows. They will grow in any garden soil, providing a goodly supply of manure or fertilizer is worked into the soil when planting. Arrange for a succession by planting a few every two weeks from May to middle of June, putting the corms down at least five inches in heavy soil and six inches in light soil, thus giving a stronger stalk, and avoiding the necessity of staking. Keep the soil around them well stirred and free of weeds. In dry weather, water freely after sundown. Not only do Gladiolus make a showy garden, but like the Lily, their principal characteristic is that they last a very long time when cut and put in water. Cut as soon as two or three of the florets appear, and the rest of the buds will expand in water, if it is changed occasionally, and a small piece of the stem cut off with a sharp knife.

In the fall after the first frost, take the bulbs up and store in the cellar away from frost, then in about a month's time remove the tops and you will find another corm or possibly two or three have formed. Dry them thoroughly before putting away for the winter and keep the little bulbs for a year or so when they will eventually give you corms that will bloom freely.

YOU can now tell how your lawn is going to look this season. If not satisfactory, dig it up completely, and make it over afresh, by adding three or four inches of good soil, and resow with a good mixture of grass seeds.

This is the last call in the vegetable line for early sowing, so during the first week make sowings of all hardy vegetables, selecting of course, the earliest varieties, and do not make the mistake of forgetting the Rotation and Succession cropping. A great deal depends on this for this year's success. Plant vegetables that grow above the ground where tap-roots grew last year and vice-versa, but do not forget that in the ground where tap-roots are going to grow the manure must be deep in trench to encourage the tap-roots to go down after it, and not have them gnarled and twisted through their coming in contact with manure that has been incorporated with the soil. Not so with the vegetables which grow above the ground, as the more roots you can have on them, the better for the crop above. You can encourage more roots to the Tomato plant by using long plants, say from twelve to eighteen inches long, putting the plant down three leaves deep, and on the slant. Nip the leaves off, but not the lateral which appears just above the leaf. when under ground you get another set of roots from every lateral. The object of planting on the slant is that the roots will not be below the surface moisture. Do not hoe around Tomato plants, but use the rake to stir the soil, as the roots have a tendency to come near the surface and are thus in danger if the hoe is used. After the fourth set of fruit is formed, pinch out the top, also all laterals and suckers that may appear, and train each plant with four shoots to each, up four stakes.

THE Celery bed should be prepared this month ready to receive the plants, choosing one or all of the following varieties: Paris Golden, White Plume, Rose Ribbed Paris, and Evans Triumph.—the latter two for winter and storage use.

Have a liquid manure barrel this year and be convinced that you can have better results, especially with Roses, Peonies, Onions, Celery and Tomatoes. Use about five shovelfuls of well-rotted manure put in a sack and throw into the barrel of water, leaving the bag in for one or two days. Add a double handful of Nitrate of Soda every time you fill the barrel.

In sowing the seeds especially of the smaller varieties, make your drill of uniform depth by using a square piece of wood, pressing it cornerwise into the soil to a depth of not more than half an inch; this is plenty deep for all seeds except Peas, Beans, Squash, Pumpkin, and Marrows. After seeds are in drill, firm them down well, to keep the air out and the moisture in. If soil is very wet, do not sow seeds, but wait a day or two. Put the Peas and Beans down two inches in a trench about six inches wide, staggering the seed about six inches each way.

With early potatoes get good sized seeds and cut in three pieces longitudinally, placing one piece every nine inches in the rows that should be two feet, six inches apart. As to depth, if soil is heavy, four inches is deep enough, but where soil is light, place them five inches deep, and be sure to keep the soil between the rows constantly stirred. Hill them up as soon as tops are six inches high, and be sure to have some Paris Green or Arsenate of Lead on hand for the pestiferous Potato bugs which are sure to be with us again.

Do not delay pruning apple trees. Remove all dead branches, and all branches that are criss-crossed, keeping the centre of the tree fairly open for the sun and air to get in. Pull up dead Raspberry canes, clipping the tops of the others above five feet high. Trim up Currant bushes and plant new ones if you haven't sufficient. And above all, provide for the spraying campaign, which must be attended to if you want good results. Get Lime and Sulphur, for trees, also Bordeaux mixture for fungus diseases and sulphide of potassium for Gooseberries; White Hellebore for Currant Caterpillar and Grape Caterpillar; Slug Shot for Cabbage; Lime and Sulphur in equal parts scattered on the ground dry, will drive the pernicious cut-worm away; Nicotine or Borax Water for the Green Aphids on Roses.

The Little "Letter-Men" Diddy Met on the May Road

THE showers of April were left behind as Diddy Happen and his friends neared the morning-gate of May Day. The gateway was arched with flowers of the early summertime, with blossoms of the wood, and rainbow treasures of the garden. One could not see what the flowers grew from, or were twined on; the arch was all of fragrant blossoms. Standing in the gateway was the Queen of Maytime, and, as the travellers approached, she began singing while every blossom joined her in the song:

Would you come into the Maytime,
If the flowers asked you to,
The primrose, or the butter-cup,
The violet so blue?

Would you linger in the Maytime,
If the bird-songs bade you stay,
The robin, or the meadow lark,
The oriole so gay?

Would you come and live in Maytime,
If May's Queen welcomed you,
To live in joy and gladness,
The merry Maytime through?

It was a morning of music. Diddy Happen and Old Dedder Naherrin were welcomed and led through the gateway by the Flower Queen. Then came the Tick-Tock brothers, the sun glinting brightly on their shiny suits. As the little party entered upon the May road, the clocks they carried, started chiming, each one with a different note, but in time and tune to the May Queen's song.

This surprised the little If very much, for the tiny clock which hung on his curly tail was chiming too. Just then, however, the If discovered that the band of Soss were marching single file behind Tick and Tock.

Each So was walking straight as a soldier, and this was the reason. Beside each one marched an odd creature, and the If saw just what you would have seen; that the newcomers were made up of letters. They were the Justs, and when you get a Just and a So together you expect them to be particular about everything they do.

But you have not been told about the May Queen, nor of the beauties of the May highway. The Queen of Springtime seemed part of the glorious morning, in her dress of gossamer with flowers in each fold and in her sun-gold hair. It was her winsome face, her joyous smile, her merry laughter, that brought more gladness to the day.

And Diddy Happen and his friends were happier too, than they had been through all their journeyings. As they walked slowly onward, they came upon a hill.

and she soon was joining in their play.

Those who travel the road of the long year must journey ever onward. So, much as Diddy and his friends would have liked to have remained longer, May Day and its Queen were left behind.

It was a wide road, and a little further on it, they saw a large, flat rock, on which were sitting several small strangers. Diddy Happen saw that these were little letter-men, but twice as large as the So or the If. There was a great clattering of tongues, for all of the little chaps were talking, and Diddy noticed that, as they sat in a circle on a large stone, a big book lay open in the centre of the ring. Diddy and his friends stopped and watched the quaint chaps.

"They are the noisiest of all the letter-men," said Old Dedder Naherrin, "but we could not do without them."

One of the little fellows stood up on the stone, and Diddy saw at once that he was a WORD.

Just then the letter-men saw Diddy, and tumbling and falling over each other in their hurry, scrambled onto the open pages of the big book, which immediately closed with a loud clap and disappeared.

"Why did they wish to run away?" asked Diddy.

"Those letter-men were all printed Words, and had no business off the pages of the book," chuckled Dedder Naherrin.

As Diddy and his friends journeyed onward, they heard a loud whirring behind them, and before they could turn to see what it was, something whirled past them. It was the Pink Star that they had last seen balanced on the May-pole. It was spinning like a cart-wheel without a rim, and was soon lost to sight over a little hill in front of them.

The travellers saw a broad river flowing through the valley below them. There was neither boat nor bridge to be seen, but a strange figure stood with outstretched arms at the water's edge. It was another letter-man, and Diddy spelled his name, S-T-O-P. They halted a short distance from the river, while the Stop kept his place in the middle of the road.

Diddy and his friends were wondering how they would be able to cross the river, when they were hailed from the farther bank. It was the Pink Star again, now floating swiftly toward them over the smooth waters. As it reached the bank nearest Diddy, the Pink Star called out loudly, "All aboard."

The Stop had disappeared, and the travellers seated themselves on the raft-like star. It was a bit crowded, but even the Soss and the little If managed to find a place.

Diddy spelled his name "S-T-O-P."

One of the "Just" men.

Trim, alert, honest, this clock laid down a policy which has stood the test of time. A policy all Westclox follow—quality.

A Yale Door Closer

completes the door

AN uncontrolled door is a nuisance and annoyance. It shakes your nerves with its banging and slamming when it is yanked shut—and it is a menace to health when it stands open admitting dust and germ-carrying drafts and odors.

Give yourself comfort and quiet and ease with a Yale Door Closer—make your door something more than a "hole in the wall." Insure yourself of doors that "close as soft as cotton"—doors that close every time, and do it without any attention or remembering on your part.

You can get the Yale Reversible Door Closer from your hardware dealer—install it yourself without any knowledge of its internal mechanism. It fits right or left hand doors without any adjustment—and comes in sizes to fit every type and kind of door.

But be sure it is a "Yale" Door Closer you get—the trade-mark "Yale" is put on it to make it easy for you to be sure. Remember to look for the trade-mark "Yale"—the same trade-mark that is the world's guide to equality and service and fitness in Cylinder Night Latches, Padlocks, and Builders' Locks and Hardware.

The basic reasons for Waltham supremacy

IN 1854 the first factory in the world to manufacture complete watch movements was opened at Waltham.

Before that, plates were fashioned in one place, screws in another, springs in another. All the parts, produced by different people in different places, were finally assembled somewhere else. As a result, the time-keeping qualities of completed movements were by no means reliable.

Waltham altered this condition.

Waltham replaced hit-or-miss methods with standardization.

At Waltham were evolved those marvellous automatic machines which replaced much hand-work, resulting in greater precision.

A modern Waltham Watch is the world's finest achievement in watch-making. To own a Waltham is not only to be assured of time accuracy, but to have the prestige which comes from possessing a watch that commands respect everywhere.

City Comforts in the Country

The Joys of Country Living Are Doubled When the Home is Equipped With a Proper Sanitary System

ONE of the first features of life in the country, which folks accustomed to city comforts miss, is the lack of a sanitary indoor toilet. This fact is as serious as it is regrettable. Not only does it spell a very great inconvenience and discomfort but it is certainly inimical to health—in many ways. Added to this is another fact quite as important: the sanitary conditions prevailing in the ordinary country home stamp rural life as deficient. Even though it is little discussed, one chief reason why young people do not stay on the farm or fail to appreciate the full joys of country living, is because of the lack of a hundred and one small details such as this. The young folks go to schools; they visit in town; they experience the comforts of modern sanitary appliances; what wonder then that the unsanitary inconvenience of the outhouse, the untidy disposal of kitchen refuse, the obnoxious flies and the general lack of modern comforts, stamp country life as inferior and turn young folks against the farm and toward the city.

Since the invention and development of the modern chemical toilet, any country or village home, no matter where or how situated, can be just as easily kept sanitary as unsanitary. It brings system and order into home and farm activities. It means having things convenient, saving time, abolition of wearisome and distasteful discomforts. With the sanitary home comes a clean and respectable yard around the house. In such a home there naturally develops a feeling of pride and respect.

THE chemical toilet system properly designed and efficiently installed, is a satisfactory solution of the problem of disposal in unsewered localities. It is true, of course, that where the owner can afford the higher price, the problem is best solved by installing a septic tank system with all the plumbing that such a system makes possible. But for the ordinary rural home the chemical toilet system is sufficient. It accomplishes the three essential things: (1) Provides an indoor toilet; (2) Gives privacy; (3) Achieves proper sanitation as approved by the leading medical and health authorities on the continent.

A chemical toilet system can be installed in a few hours. It is, comparatively speaking, low in price. But because of its simplicity and low cost, it offers a temptation to some manufacturers to produce an inferior equipment, lacking in essential features of design. The chemical toilet system, it should be clearly understood, is more than a mere chemical commode. Properly designed, it is a complete, self-contained sewage disposal system. It is a vital principle to have the bowl properly aerated. The action of fresh air on decayed vegetable or animal matter, as you have probably noticed, is to dry out the moisture, destroying odor. Bacteria cannot grow without moisture. A current of air in the toilet arrests their growth by removing moisture through evaporation. A good chemical toilet system therefore should have a scientifically planned ventilation system to create suction in and around the toilet bowl, aerating its interior surfaces, and at the same time drawing off any chemical gas through a ventilation pipe which goes through the roof or chimney.

A SECOND feature the purchaser should look for is in the quality of the equipment. The tank which holds the sewage and chemical is usually made of iron. An improperly treated iron will be quickly ruined by rust and chemical action. It is a further advantage if the tank is equipped with some device in the nature of an agitator to hasten the process of liquefaction and hence of sterilization and purification. A chemical toilet system has no flush valves, joints and traps. It is only necessary to drain off the tank very infrequently—on the average, about twice a year. It is usual, though not essential, to do this by connecting the tank to a leaching pool made of an old rain-barrel, sunk into the ground and filled with stones.

The chemical approved by the authorities has caustic properties which liquefy all vegetable and animal matter and completely purify sewage, reducing it to the original natural substances, suitable for mingling again with the soil. The chemical should be in flake form making it easier and safer to handle. The cost for chemical for the average family calls for only a quite insignificant expenditure every year.

A chemical toilet system, can be located wherever convenient about the rural home, on the second or on the ground floor.

An Indoor Toilet for Health, Comfort, Pride

Only a few hours' job will get rid of the abominable outhouse

NO one living in the country need put up with the discomfort and disagreeable features of a loathsome outhouse. And no one ought to. For the outhouse spells disease—it is the thief of good health.

Science has devised a simple, effective system of sewage disposal for rural places and unserved localities. A system that gives perfect sanitation; that makes an indoor toilet possible; that gives the same comfort, convenience and privacy as folks in the city have where water closets are used; that is just as free from trouble; that adds just as much refinement to the home.

Simple, Scientific, Effective

Yet the Kaustine system needs no water, no sewer connections. Note the two illustrations at the right. Kaustine chemical—a powerful disinfectant—aided by the propeller agitator, immediately breaks up sewage in the tank, destroys germs, eliminates odors.

Health authorities all over the continent have given this system their approval. Because it is absolutely sanitary. Because it gets rid of unhealthy flies and odors.

Thoroughly ventilated — so that suction keeps the inner surface of the bowl dry.

Don't confuse the Kaustine Waterless Toilet with a mere chemical commode or closet which has to be baled out—often. The Kaustine system needs attention but twice a year. And even this means only opening a simple valve which may be connected to a drain pipe, carrying off the sterilized sewage to a leaching pool.

Quickly Installed

Anyone can install the Kaustine system. And it can be done in a few hours. No expert help is needed. There is no complicated work—the units go together without trouble.

It can be located in your home wherever convenient—in a lean-to, in one of the rooms, upstairs or downstairs.

And less than fifty bushels of wheat will buy it!

In Summer — Infested with Disease-Bearing Flies.

Positive Long-Term Guarantee

The tank and all metal parts of this system are made of Armco (rustless) Iron, and are specially treated. They will outlast a lifetime.

The bowl is of vitreous china, attractively designed. Seat is oak. Extra heavy nickel-plated bar hinge. A quality job through and through! There are over 40,000 Kaustine systems in use—in schools, factories, railway stations, farm homes. With every installation we have given our positive long-term guarantee of satisfaction.

ribbons and feathers. A close fitting turban to match her suit, if she can wear a tight fitting shape, will probably give the greatest degree of satisfaction, but as the summer approaches, one finds the brims stretching out a little in every direction and for mid-summer leghorn and transparent hair braids will be a happy selection.

Brown hose will be worn with brown or tan shoes, with navy blue or brown costume navy or black hose will be worn, with black shoes and with white ones, white hose of course.

LINGERIE and negligee, although left to the last, are by no means the least important item of the trousseau. There are so many gems to be picked up that the shopping expedition which has these garments for its objective should be a joy indeed.

We look in the shop windows and see the most wonderful gowns made of exquisite georgette, crepe de chine, or satin and one wonders if they were meant for fairies, so fragile are they. They are gowns in name only—at least a great many of them are. They were really designed for negligee and are worn in one's boudoir with an equally dainty matinee jacket of the same or a harmonizing colored georgette crepe, daintily trimmed with lace and ribbons, preferably the two-tone ribbon as for instance buttercup on one side and orchid on the other. There are negligees that are really negligees, however; the designer has fashioned them to slip over the head and then showered them with beautiful silk lace.

LOVE silk will be found made up into all kinds of undergarments such as vests, bloomers, envelopes and the white or colored petticoat of jersey with accordion pleated bottom will be found almost indispensable to the smart trousseau. Dainty bloomers are cut like a double apron with openings on the sides to let the limbs through and an elastic in the top. They serve the purpose of a short inside petticoat. Envelope chemises will be found in great variety and camisoles with petticoats of lace suspended from them and the most delectable of camisoles and brassieres for any and every occasion, and lest we forget it, corsets for negligee attire, for evening wear and of course for all practical purposes. The vogue of colored underwear is very strong and one may carry out a color scheme in one's lingerie from the undervest to the petticoat and camisole. Pale shell pink or flesh color as it is so often called, orchid and a beautiful shade of blue called areo are the colors which Fashion seems to favor, after white. To assure the happiness of the bride-to-be who shall wear these garments, some of the designers have adorned them with bluebirds, butterflies and Chinese emblems of long life and happiness.

THERE are also delectable things to be found in cotton, such as the French hand-embroidered pieces, those from Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands which try to rival the beauty and handicraft of the French garments and the Swiss embroidered pieces, something that we have not been able to get for many a long month, but which are once again to be had.

There are many other things of which one might write, did time and space but permit; there are the new bungalow aprons, house dresses, porch dresses, sweater coats, the beautiful translucent rain coats, other boudoir conceits than those we have mentioned such as caps, negligees, garters, mules, little rosettes, and flowers to fasten on one's lingerie, but some day these will be the theme of another story.

VICTORY OVER BLINDNESS.

"It can be made very interesting to start a new life," writes Sir Arthur Pearson, in his book, "Victory over Blindness." "For that is what a blinded man has to do. The sooner he ceases to repine for those pleasures that depend essentially on sight the better. Other senses begin to develop latent and unsuspected powers. Sounds, touches, scents, convey to him images that, colored by experience and imagination, arise realistically out of the darkness."

THE ALMOSTS—By Helen MacMurchy

THE work of Dr. Helen MacMurchy is so well known throughout the Dominion that she needs no introduction to JOURNAL readers. The Civil Service Commission at Ottawa has recently appointed Dr. MacMurchy to take charge of the Child Welfare Division in connection with the newly instituted Ministry of Health—and every Canadian acquainted with Dr. MacMurchy's work, whether as teacher, physician or in connection with the work for the feeble-minded as carried on under the Ontario Government, rejoices in the wisdom of the Commission's choice.

The publication at this time of Dr. MacMurchy's book, "The Almosts," which is a study of the feeble-minded, is of peculiar interest, since it is but recently that the community has recognized its responsibility toward this class of citizens—afflicted and handicapped, but by no means useless. The five chapters of this volume consider such characters as presented by the great writers from Shakespeare to Nathaniel Hawthorne, and conclude with an appeal to give them a chance. We are permitted to publish the following extracts from the closing chapter:—

"Simple pleasures and occupations are all the feeble-minded need. The occupations of children make them perfectly happy. Barnaby, a strong man, playing with his skein of string, listening to the same interminable story which his mother told him every day, and which he never remembered the next day, is the very type of the feeble-minded person who can be made and kept happy, safe and well occupied at little expense and with great success and benefit to himself and others. The marvelous improvement that care, kindness and training bring about in the feeble-minded is almost incredible to those who have not learned it at first hand. Maggy, who 'was never to be more than ten years old, however long she lived,' under the motherly care of Little Dorrit 'began to take pains to improve herself,' 'got enough to do to support herself,' 'was allowed to come in and out as often as she liked.'

"There are those like 'Jo' and 'Sloppy' and 'Alice' who are accused of being mentally defective when they are far otherwise. Beware the gifted amateur, particularly those bearing Binet tests which they do not understand. Beware also the de-humanized expert—another great public danger. We should all consider ourselves 'Counsel for the Accused' and never whisper 'feeble-minded' unless and until mental defect is clearly and unquestionably proved.

"The dark tragedies involved in this problem are, naturally, and properly enough, lightly touched upon in fiction. Miss Fanny, though she said Young Sparkler was 'almost an idiot,' and despised him for his mental feebleness, married him in the end. He could not earn a living—he had no more mind or will of his own than 'a boat when it is towed by a steamship.'

"But we realize now what no one realized then—that marriage with a mental defective brings the curse of mental defect upon the children. Many of the Susan Nippers and Miss Fannys of the present generation know that now, and soon all will know it.

"Little Dorrit showed right feeling and a true instinct in dealing with the mentally defective. She was a 'Little Mother' to poor Maggy, but she said she would far rather see her sister working hard for a living than rich and married to Young Sparkler. We do wrong when we permit a mental defective to become a parent.

"Those who know anything about the work of orphanages, refuges and other charitable institutions; those who have been on duty in 'locked wards' or maternity wards of hospitals; those who are aware of the problem of the poor unfathered baby (did you ever think to yourself how innocent that baby is!); those who work for prison reform—no such person needs to be told what feeble-mindedness costs in hard cash, in self-respect, in social degradation—and degeneracy. 'Our duty to our neighbor must now be held to include our duty to posterity.' We never shall conquer our two worst social evils until we deal with and remove this stumbling-block of the mental defective which stands in a causal relation to them both. It is not the only thing we have to do, but is there any other one thing that would help as much in solving our social problems as dealing firmly, wisely and kindly with mentally defective persons?

"These two problems are closely connected with each other, and they cannot be effectively dealt with unless we stop neglecting the mentally defective and reorganize charitable institutions, work for dependents and delinquents, procedure in criminal courts, and, above all, education and school-work, according to the facts, recognizing mental defectives as children, the wards of the State, who must receive the training, protection and care—in one word, the home that they need, so that they do not mingle with the general community. Hattie Wanhope was recognized at school. She should have been taken into care then. Poor Hattie is far more dangerous to the Nation than Maggy or Barnaby Rudge.

"A hundred years ago people began to deal more justly, kindly and sensibly with lunatics and with mental defectives because they began to conjecture that lunatics were sick and had need of a physician, and mental defectives were permanent children and needed permanent parents. In the hundred years since, in our well-meant efforts to do good, we have often only tried to help the mentally unfit to do the things they are unfit to do, such as attempting to make a home. The mentally defective are those who cannot make, or help to make, a home.

"We must make a happy and permanent home for them during their lives. The only Permanent Parent is the State.

"If a hundred years—and the Great War—and the sacrifice of the 'chief of our strength' in this generation—the glory of our youth—who gave their lives for the Peace and the Freedom and the Justice of the world—if THIS—and the coming of Democracy, so that we all have a share in determining national thinking and acting—have made us wiser—and there are signs that seem to say 'Yes'—then the mind of the Nation will rise nearer to the level of our great writers, and we shall see somewhat more clearly what is and what is not meant by this National problem of the mentally defective, and see our duty to them and to the Nation—and set ourselves to do it."

The Made-in-Canada Magazine

AS we are approaching the celebration of Canada's fifty-third birthday, would it not be well to ask ourselves: "How Canadian Are We?" Do we sing "O Canada" and "The Maple Leaf Forever," and then stop and buy a made-in-New-York-or-Philadelphia magazine as we are returning from the patriotic parade? Then it would be well for us to admit that ours is a lip loyalty which does not extend as far south as the pocket.

Circumstances are altering circulations, and this fact was concretely set forth last month, when the statement was made that Toronto is now receiving from fifty-four to sixty-one less tons of American magazines each week than during former times. Of one American weekly all supplies to news-dealers have been stopped. The serious paper shortage in the United States has brought about this condition—and the situation is not likely to show any change to wider distribution.

The excellence in style and contents of many weekly and monthly publications coming to Canada from the United States will be cheerfully admitted by all readers. That they should be read to the exclusion of worthy Canadian publications is neither a patriotic nor a progressive policy for the Canadian public. If your home is to be truly Canadian in atmosphere, then you must have not only the Canadian newspaper, but the made-in-Canada magazine also.

Give the literature and art of the Dominion a chance and you will find yourself a better Canadian, with a Sydney-to-Victoria width of outlook.

O CANADA!

A MERICANS think cultivated English speech affected to absurdity. They are never tired of caricaturing it. A representative American—from Chicago—not long ago expressed to me his astonishment when he found young British officers, in France, who conversed in a fashion that seemed to him the limit of fatuity, particularly good at their jobs. It seemed to him that people who talked in so foolish a fashion must have some vacuity to match. He did not realize, as he amiably snapped, and good-naturedly snarled these opinions at me, that the difference in the speech of the educated Englishman and the educated American arises simply from the fact that the Englishman is taught to speak, and the American, generally speaking, is not. The talk of a child in an upper-class English family is watched. If he begins to drop his h's or catch a Cockney accent from his nurse, the tendency is corrected. One important reason why English children are sent home early from India is that they may not acquire the much disliked "chi-chi" inflection so characteristic of the "country-bred" European. The intonation and production of the voice is thought so important, that it has become a test for class, especially among men. "He spoke like a gentleman"; "he had the voice of a gentleman,"—how often one hears that phrase in England! And how difficult it would be to apply any such test on this side of the Atlantic.

Canadians are more respectful to the "English accent" than Americans are—indeed they admire and enjoy it, especially in the theatres. "It is so delightful to hear English voices," is often said of a travelling company in this country. But the flattery stops short of emulation. Like the Americans, we neglect the education of the voice. The manner of speech of the majority of the people has been allowed to capture the conversation of the whole nation, and the majority is much too busy on farms and in factories, to pay much attention to the mere matter of talking. Educated Canadians are careful about their grammar and the pronunciation of long words, and seem to think the matter ends there. Boys at the public schools talk as the other boys talk—there is a subconscious feeling that to be more particular would not be good democratic manners. Strong flavours of the Irish, Scotch and North Country immigrants survive in our speech, though actual brogue, like the Cockney quality, is soon lost in the general Americanization of the language.

I T is a hard saying and not a pleasant reflection, but I do not think that Canadians of the present generation in the least realize how badly they speak. Their fathers and mothers, still more their grandfathers and grandmothers, nearer to the parent tongue in the parent islands, have far better qualities of voice. The conviction is borne in upon me by hearing my young compatriots ridicule American speech. How shall I ever hope to be forgiven when I declare that their own is often worse! I am speaking now, as constantly, of the well-to-do body of our people, not of a comparative few of careful training and acquaintance with other standards than their own, who, in Canada, as in the United States, speak English as it is spoken in Edinburgh or Oxford, or anywhere else by cultivated people. Apart from these, comparison of the speech of our professional and business classes, with that of the same folk on the other side of the line, especially east of Chicago, cannot be said to rebound in our favour to any sensitive ear. The Americans have a net quality in their talk, an incisiveness and a clearness that we have not. They have also more variety of inflection, and they flat there is no reason why we should not have it in that condition. And in any case it is perhaps well to be wary of the enthusiasm that pronounces "Canada" "Conada," in the indiscriminating adoption of that vowel by the England-returned. But how often do you hear the "o" in "or" and "for" given its proper roundness, and how often do you hear "er" and "fer"? Do we trouble to get out the whole of "to-morrow," or do we use the indolent Irish "to-morrah"? What about "you" and "your"? I hear them "yeh," and "yer," "It" is nearly always "ut," "Can" is apt to slide into "kin." The final "ing" in "going" is prone to disappear altogether—"goin'" we say, in our haste. It is the slovenly Irish that have demoralized us most, because their enunciation is the easiest.

W E are not by nature a buoyant people. Neither are the Americans, for all their levity, and we less than they. Take any Pullman car and consider the faces. Youth has a certain inalienable cheer, but few Canadians over forty show it. Men and women alike, but particularly the men, wear an expression of extreme seriousness. In the men it is plainly the result of extreme concentration upon business—they cannot so much as read a newspaper without girding their loins. Anxiety is more graven upon the faces of the ladies, with a little plaintiveness—perhaps the reflex from a domestic situation that has never been too easy. And this mental attitude is again given forth in the tones of the Canadian voice. Like the American, it is almost entirely composed of head notes, yet it has a low and melancholy pitch, as if all the vocal chords were permanently depressed. This often adds immensely to the effect in telling a funny story, but, unhappily, funny stories have but a small part in the communications of daily life. I know a pair of lovely Canadian girls, happy, normal, attractive girls, the pitch of whose conversation is one complaining whine. They are not in the least aware of it, and, oddly enough, they sing quite agreeably. As a rule, our Canadian voice is flat, dry, drawling and monotonous. It has little emotional richness or inflectional variety. The substitute, among men, for these things, is an over-emphasis, oddly applied, to brief sentences upon unimportant matters.

There is no reason why this should be so. Our vocal equipment is as good as that of any other nation. Our chests are as broad, our lungs as deep. Our outlook on life is as gay and as hopeful. We have simply never thought of the necessity of voice training—left it to come of itself; and it has come of itself with a vengeance.

First, we should think about voice production—make a habit of listening privately, criticising and comparing. The worst of our tricks and carelessnesses are easily recognized and avoided. In the course of time, we may come to realize that it is no derogation of our independence to bring a few teachers of elocution across the Atlantic. It is no defence to hold that the English of Canada is just as good as the English of England. It isn't. You don't expect to find the best French in Quebec, or go to Cuba for Spanish. It is a disability of the colonial states that practice of the language must to some extent degenerate. There is no reason, however, once the fact is recognized, why it should not be effectively dealt with.

"A Mail Order Bride"

OUR NEW CANADIAN SERIAL

MR. P. W. LUCE.

O UT of the West has come a Canadian story of a ranch and a matrimonial agency—not to mention a ride on the Cariboo Trail—which will keep you interested for the next half-year. The writer of this notable tale of Northern British Columbia is P. W. Luce, now of the "Vancouver World," who belongs to the Island of Jersey by birth and to Canada's Pacific Province by choice. Mr. Luce has been journalist, rancher, salesman, prospector, trapper, and, withal, is very modest concerning his own adventures.

He has written extensively on topics ranging from agriculture to jokes for "Judge." His boys' stories have made him the friend of thousands of young readers who have recognized a kindred adventurer.

"A Mail Order Bride," for which the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL has secured serial rights, is concerned with the needs of a lonely bachelor on a Northern ranch, whose partner, on leaving, suggests that the forlorn one secure a bride by mail, through a Cupid's Exchange in Vancouver. The situation is, to say the least, piquant—and the characters are such as you will not forget. You will be sure to like Mollie Aiken and Bessie Ingraham, to say nothing of Frank Hayes; and whether you like Cory Harrigan or not, you will not be able to forget him.

So, be sure to read the first chapters of "A Mail Order Bride" in our July issue.

speak no whit more through their noses than do we. It is a habit which they, and not we, have planted on this continent, but it has spread across the border, and thrives all too abundantly on our side.

B UT these are general charges, and I may well be asked to particularize. Am I finding fault because Canadians do not find it "natural" to use the broad "a"? Not at all. If we like our "grass"

An Artist Has a Strange Experience in Finding that the Supreme Beauty is of the Soul

JUDGMENT

By BEATRICE REDPATH

ILLUSTRATED BY E. J. DINSMORE

IF it were not for the curious end to the affair it would not be worth relating. It was so manifestly ironic; one of those cases where life appears in the guise of an irrepressible jester, turning to smile behind his hand. Yet, in spite of the burlesque irony of it all, there was something unquestionably fine in the way in which Knowles cast down his idols, tossed them aside, denied their very existence. For Knowles' idols had been firmly placed. Anyone knowing him at that time would have said that, as he was, so he would have continued to the end. But there is always in life the incalculable factor, the eternal surprise in the play of circumstance upon character which upsets all calculations.

I never knew Lena at all intimately, so I could not be conscious of the personal element as far as she was concerned. To me she was as the character in a play, perhaps even more like a shadowy figure projected on a screen. She passed and re-passed before me a score of times, yet nothing of herself penetrated my consciousness except the fact that she was uncommonly beautiful—and Knowles had told me that.

He would sit and talk of her in quite an absurd fashion; there was no doubt that he was indignantly proud of his wife. My ethics had always forbidden me to discuss woman, but as I have said before, Lena, for me, was not so much a woman of my acquaintance as a character to be dissected. A Helen of Troy, or a Cleopatra, whose beauty had in it all the potential elements for tragedy. Knowles would sit on my verandah, his arms crossed upon his flat chest, seated with a convenient view of his own front lawn, where perhaps Lena would be playing with the puppy or working over her rose bushes, and he would talk of her while I wondered all the while at the curious fashion in which he could speak of her. It was quite as impersonal as though she were a fine piece of pottery or a portrait which he had been clever enough to pick up at a sale.

Sitting on my verandah one summer evening, the scent of the honeysuckle that sheltered the northern end of the house, seeming to thicken the frail dusk, Knowles as usual started off on his favorite topic.

"Lena was educated to be beautiful," he said, "she's been trained to it ever since she was a child."

I laughed lightly at this without taking the trouble to respond. It was so like Knowles. He was forever making just such absurd remarks. His ideas were usually, from my way of thinking, mere moonshine and fantasy.

"Oh, you may laugh," he went on calmly, "but why isn't it possible to teach a child to be beautiful? Is there nothing then in the power of suggestion?"

I smiled in silent acquiescence with any theory which Knowles might care to foist upon me. I was feeling altogether too indolent to enter into a discussion at that moment. You could not argue a point with Knowles. He was too impractical.

"Well, then, it isn't nonsense in the case of Lena," he continued. "She regards beauty as I do, as the supreme essential in life."

I mused thoughtfully over his words and called up to my mind a vision of Lena, picturing to myself the delicate perfection of her face, the golden sheen of her hair, the droop of her heavy lidded eyes, with the stiff lashes which made the pupil appear so bewilderingly star-like. She was disturbingly beautiful. You felt that she should be cast in bronze so that the multiplying years should not blur nor destroy. That such a high perfection of art must needs be perishable, must of necessity fade, filled you with a vague disquietude. And all this beauty Knowles affirmed had been created by suggestion. He was impossible with his exaggerated theories.

"Beauty," he continued, now leaning his head against the back of his chair and staring out at the summer dusk, "is the will o' the wisp that calls you over the world. It's everything and it's nothing; it's as elusive as the tail of the rainbow; it's in the curve of a line, in a shadow thrown by a cloud. It's the flicker of starlight, the mist over the moon, the bloom on the fruit, the shine of the sea. It's the nearest approach to Divinity that we know of. It's everything," he repeated, with emphasis. "Without beauty life would be worth nothing, simply nothing at all."

"After all," I put in meditatively, following up the processes of his thought, "these things are the mere surfaces of life."

"What are you saying?" he ejaculated, and his tone tossed aside my words as so much chaff. "Beauty is the very core of life."

I fell silent again, convinced that it was of no avail to argue the point with him. Later I watched him go down the steps and cross the road through spreading pools of moonlight, and I wondered about Lena. Was she just the lay figure she appeared to be from the way he spoke of her? Perhaps she herself was quite content merely to fill his requirements; perhaps she cared for nothing beyond her own beauty. Since that was Knowles' attitude towards her, I sincerely hoped so. If she had been trained to this end ever since she was a child, it was natural to suppose that she was content with the role forced upon her. But the more I thought of Lena in conjunction with Knowles, the more she intrigued me. It was a curious life she led here in the suburbs, for a woman who was so obviously beautiful. I could not imagine that Knowles, with his pale face and plastered hair could inspire in her a great devotion. Knowles was not inspiring. And at that time he was essentially an egoist.

I BEGAN to watch Lena rather more closely from my verandah whenever I saw her appear upon her lawn across the road, and I began to realize that I felt rather sorry for Lena. I thought that Knowles had no right to make so clear to her his requirements. It was all very well for him to be on his knees to her beauty, but that he should continually make her aware that he required it of her was another thing. How could she look forward with anything but black dread, to the time when her beauty must fade? That is, if she cared for Knowles. I had not as yet made up my mind upon that point.

I noticed that she always wore a wide-brimmed hat in her garden, and pulled long gloves over her slim hands when she tended her roses. Small indications of her unceasing care to guard that which Knowles so cherished. Each day at the same hour she went for a walk with the puppy, and each day after lunch I noticed that the yellow blind in the front room upstairs was pulled down; Lena was taking her afternoon sleep.

How could a woman submit to making herself such a puppet, I wondered. I began to lose patience with Lena, and regarded her with a certain amount of contempt, which I realized was not quite deserved. For, after all, if Knowles continually asserted that her beauty was absolutely essential to his happiness and condemned any intellect in a woman as quite superfluous, Lena's course was not to be wondered at. It was Knowles who was in the wrong. Some day, I thought, I would reopen the subject with him and make him see that it was not fair to Lena, and if he cared for her he must widen her scope in life. But, after all, though one may think of pointing out such things to one's friends, one hesitates to do so when the moment arrives.

And then I missed Lena for a day or so. Knowles told me when he came over one evening that she had gone to New York to shop, and for a time I completely forgot about her. I lost interest in the working out of the little drama that I had staged just beyond my front door. Not that at that time I was conscious that it was to develop into drama. But nevertheless I knew a shock of surprise when one evening Knowles appeared on the steps of my verandah, just after I had finished dinner. He had a letter in his hand, and seemed decidedly agitated. I asked him to sit down and light his pipe, but ignoring my invitation he passed me the letter and told me to read it. I glanced over it hurriedly, and then read it through carefully a second time before I looked up. He was standing before me regarding me with close attention, as though to read my first impressions of the letter.

"Well, what do you make of it?" he said at length.

I glanced down at the letter again before replying. It was just a matter of a few lines from Lena, telling him in the most casual manner possible that she had no intention of returning to him. She said that there was nothing to be gained by their seeing one another, as she was quite fixed in her resolve. She finished by saying that he would please her best if he made no effort whatever to seek her out.

"I suppose there is nothing much to make of it," I responded, turning the letter over in my hands. "Apparently she means what she says. There is nothing for you to do I should say, but to accept it."

"You think—you think—" he stammered, searching my face, "that there is someone else?"

"Lena is a very beautiful woman," I responded.

He sat down then and sank into a heavy silence from which I made no effort to rouse him. There seemed nothing to be said further. The curtain had simply gone down on the first act of the little drama which I had anticipated. My surprise was that Lena should have a mind capable of taking any such definite course. I could not find myself blaming her much, nor help feeling that Knowles had only got what he deserved. If he had insisted upon treating Lena as nothing but a beautiful picture to hang upon the walls of his house, it was only fitting that he should make the discovery that after all she was flesh and blood. Her whole course of procedure was puzzling, however. It was so far from what I would actually have expected of Lena. It was so clear cut. It takes character to make a clean and swift decision, and I had almost persuaded myself that Lena had none. I was obliged to alter my ideas concerning her. I wondered about her, building up romantic scenes in my mind, staging Lena as heroine. But somehow they never seemed to fit. It was like a puzzle where some of the pieces are lost.

For a time I expected each day that I would see Lena appear on the lawn opposite, and hear that she had come back, repentant for an injudicious escapade. I was quite certain that this would be the end of it. It was the only fitting climax that I could foresee. But the days went by and there was no sign of Lena. Knowles never alluded to her. His pride was badly scarred, but I imagined that that was the whole amount of his hurt. It was as though some connoisseur had outbid him for an art treasure. He was thwarted and angry. But he took care not to show even these feelings by any chance remark. He would come over and sit with me just as before, only we did not speak of Lena. That was the only difference. He would talk instead of the decay of the art of the present day, he would rail against some critic whose views he did not hold with, or he would go into an enthusiastic description of a book he had read, or an exhibition of pictures he had seen. He was a curious character, Knowles.

I would sit and look at him, at his long, thin face and plastered hair, while I wondered about him. He had a way of putting so utterly outside of his horizon anything which displeased him. He was heedless to all the suffering in the world. It simply did not interest him. He felt himself detached from it, it was not his concern. He had what appeared to me to be almost an unhealthy craving for beauty around him, and when he perceived it certain pulses would seem to vibrate in the complex organism of his mind. He would become quite oblivious of his surroundings, the conversation as far as he was concerned would become a mere trail of abandoned words, and he would sit back in his chair, his arms crossed on his thin chest, while his eyes would be positively alight. I have seen him like this over the mere line of a tumble-down dwelling, the curve of a roadway, a bank of cloud. Yes, he was a curious character in every sense.

I USED to wonder if he had ever heard anything more about Lena, but apparently the subject was not one to be mentioned between us. I carefully avoided anything which might touch upon it, but I always hoped that some day he would mention her. Lena interested me more than Knowles. I felt that she had a complete sense of drama. The way in which she had walked off the stage was quite majestic in its absolute lack of all explanation. It was so simple in its accomplishment. And, when all's said, it is the simple actions in life that partake of greatness.

I met Knowles one hot summer afternoon, hurrying to the station to catch the suburban train from the city. The streets were crowded at that hour, packed with tired humanity, all eager for an escape from the day's labors. I thought, with a sense of pleasure, of my own cool verandah, shaded by elm trees. The jaded faces I passed wrung me to pity. So many returning to rooms that were even hotter, rooms that were a mere excuse for a dwelling place. I thought of all the hot tossed pillows, pressed by heads seeking to find in dreams some little alleviation of reality, and I felt poignantly the awful unfairness of life. What had I done that I should have so much more than these? What a thing life was for the greater number! When was the balance to be readjusted; when were these to receive full measure to atone for the hungry years? I made some comment of the kind to Knowles, but he brushed it aside as he put away from him everything of the sort. It did not appear on his horizon, therefore there was no necessity for him to be concerned about it. I looked at his anaemic face and wondered, as I had often done, if anything could ever penetrate his armour. I could not understand how anyone who could so vibrate to beauty could go so untouched by suffering. The senses which are acute to the one are usually just as sensitive to the other.

I was thinking over this, when suddenly, just ahead of us, I seemed to recognize the back of a woman who was striving like ourselves to find a passage through the crowd. There was something oddly familiar in the pose of her head and in the line of her shoulders. I was wondering vaguely where I had seen her before, when illumination burst upon me.

"Lena!" I exclaimed involuntarily.

The woman turned and I had a swift and terrible impression of a face scarred beyond recognition. Before I had time to collect my stunned faculties she had turned swiftly away, and in another moment, while I stood stupidly staring after her, she had pushed her way through an opening in the crowd and disappeared.

I turned and looked questioningly at Knowles. I thought, or I may have simply imagined it, that his face was more oddly colourless than usual. He replied to my silent question, while absolutely ignoring my previous exclamation.

"Horrible!" he said. "It is terrible the things you see in a crowd of this description."

I continued to look at him, still strangely puzzled. His face was quite expressionless. I had been sure that the woman was Lena, but I assured myself now that I had been mistaken. If it had been Lena, Knowles would certainly have known. After all, I could not have been certain of a single feature in the woman's face. I was only deeply conscious of that red line running at right angles. It was an unfortunate mistake of mine. I wished that Lena's name had not been wrung from me by that intangible resemblance. Knowles did not refer in any way to my abrupt exclamation, and gradually I dismissed the whole matter from my mind.

It seems to me that I did not see so much of him for some time after this incident. I was away for a time and when I came back I found a pile of work which had accumulated in my absence, which kept me busy in the evenings as well as during the day. When at length I did see Knowles, he appeared to me, or was it merely my imagination, to have changed in some indefinite way. He was more silent, he would sit for long periods without speaking, his arms folded, peering out into the darkness beyond the verandah, a curious expression upon his face. I did not care to force his confidence, so I smoked my pipe in silence and left him to his own thoughts. Sometimes I wondered at the cause for this change in him, and could not help thinking that it dated from the unfortunate incident in the crowded street. But I dismissed this as absurd. I knew my imagination was too prone to manufacture a cause to fit the effect.

He began to come even more often than before, and asked me in almost a humble fashion if I objected to his sitting so much on my verandah. "It's lonely sitting there in an empty house," he said, with a curious self-conscious laugh. "I am beginning to dislike my own society."

The Thought (An Allegory)

OFTEN the people said: 'We have quite enough Thoughts of our own. What need have we of new ones when the old suffice? Besides, it is against our principles to entertain strange Thoughts.'

"Others asked briefly: 'Who sent you?' And when I told them, they said: 'We do not know him,' and closed the door."

"At last I stood upon the threshold of one for whom the sun had gone out, and she stretched forth her hands to me and cried: 'Little Thought, they tell me thou art fair. Come to me, that I may feel of thy beauty.' Very gently she passed her fingers over my face and touched the strange Word-garb in which I was wrapped. Then she said: 'O Thought, I am glad thou didst come, for thou art very beautiful. The memory of thee shall stay with me in the dark.' And I was glad that to one, at least, I had brought happiness."

"Next I came to a man who was weeping bitterly; and I touched him on the shoulder and said: 'Friend, let me soothe thy grief. For I am a Beautiful Thought, and am come to smile upon thy heart and give thee courage.'

"He stopped weeping for a moment and, looking up, asked: 'Canst thou restore the dead?' And I answered: 'I can fill thy soul with peace.' But he turned away and wept again."

"Some asked me: 'Canst thou give us Fame?' And I answered: 'That is for you to win.' Another, when he saw me, pitied me, but laughed. 'Thou art too dainty and delicate a Thought,' he said, 'for this rough world. Thou wouldst need a fist of iron and a voice of thunder to stir mankind to-day. This is the hour for the conquering giants—not frail pigmies such as thou.' And sorrowfully I journeyed on."

"Many and many were those to whom I gave the message, but they would not heed. And now, O Thinker, I have come back, for the World needs me not."

Then all the other Thoughts stretched out their hands in sympathy and cried: "Come, play with us and be happy again!"

But the little Thought shook its head and answered: "No; I have no heart to play. I would rest. Give me sleep or death, I care not which, so long as I forget."

Then it tore off the ragged Words and threw aside the cloak of language, which was dusty and full of holes, and crept into a sheltering fold of the Thinker's brain to sleep; for it was very tired.

Gently and silently across its couch Time's tender fingers wove the Cobwebs of Forgetfulness and stretched the Curtain of Peace; and now the little Thought is only a Memory, sleeping among the other Memories in the Thinker's brain.

I became accustomed to seeing him sitting in the corner of my verandah, a dark, silent figure, and I felt vaguely sorry for him. Whatever was the cause, there was no doubt that in some way the man was suffering intensely, he who had always banished suffering from his horizon. And yet I did not feel that it would do him any harm. It might make him more human, more sympathetic to the misfortunes of others. Already I felt that he was more capable of understanding a wider scope of life than he had hitherto done. How this had been accomplished, I did not conjecture even to myself.

I WAS feeling very much more in sympathy with him than I had ever done before, as late one afternoon we swung out of the woods bordering High Park, sheltering it from the full sweep of the sea wind. Knowles had been speaking of his student days in Paris, of his dreams and ambitions, and of how little he had accomplished of all he had set himself to do. He had been pulled too many ways in his continual quest for perfection; sadly he stated that he had succeeded in none. We were arguing as to the meaning of success in life, as the full panorama of the sea swept upon us, silencing us by the pure magic of the view. The cliffs dropped sheer to a sea of amethyst, shaken into silver by the light wind, the sky clear amber, broken only by the sharp edge of the new moon. Far on the horizon a tramp steamer seemed to lie motionless, only the betraying smoke clinging golden to the sky indicating movement. We stood silent, until the echo of a remark spoken by Knowles some time ago came to my lips.

"It's the nearest approach to Divinity that we know of. I think you are right, Knowles . . . something like this . . . it seems to lift one right out of oneself."

I was not prepared for the swift change that swept over him. He turned his back on it all, on the sea, the sky, and the circle of the young moon, and walked rapidly down the road ahead of me. The expression of his face as I came up to him filled me with wondering surprise. He did not speak until we had gone some distance, and I was afraid to break in upon his curious preoccupation. This chance remark of mine had set flowing some dark currents through his mind. I rather imagined that I understood, but until this moment I had not known Knowles to turn his back on beauty. The scene itself had roused him to some emotion, I fancied, rather than my remark.

"Don't speak to me of beauty," he said suddenly, "I have done with beauty forever."

I could make no reply to this. Then abruptly he turned and faced me, a tall, dark figure, against the green gloom of the trees which surrounded us on the outskirts of the park. "It was Lena," he said, with an amazing suddenness, and then was silent again, waiting for my surprised ejaculation. But I made none. I was not surprised, except in the manner of his telling it to me. After a moment's pause, as I made no reply, he said curiously:

"You knew?"

"I couldn't be sure," I replied briefly. He took a few more steps in silence.

"Curious," he said, speaking in a strained tone of voice, "what one will do in a crisis. You don't know, say whatever you like, but you can't tell what you will do. Lay the situation before me just as it was and I would have said that any man would have rushed forward, no matter what his feelings might have been. Even the veriest cur . . . but I didn't . . . I held back . . . I couldn't have stirred . . . I felt frozen with the utter horror of it."

He paused and I vaguely murmured something ineffectual.

"I suppose," he went on, "that it was the training of years. I had always refused to look at suffering, at ugliness, at everything that was abominable. It hurt too much. Ever since I was a child I'd close my eyes if I saw a cripple in the street. I couldn't bear anything of the sort. Cowardly, yes! I would only admit of the beautiful side of life. I abandoned the rest. You can train yourself to that the same as to anything else."

He stopped to strike a match, and the flare of it lit up his face. The man was baring his soul to me, dissecting his most hidden feelings, and the mark of them was upon his features.

"I wonder if you can understand," he went on, "Lena, because she was no longer beautiful, simply did not exist for me. There was a woman standing there who had a natural claim upon me . . . but for me the claim no longer held. Lena had been beautiful . . . then since Lena was no longer beautiful it simply wasn't Lena. I stood there and let her pass on in the crowd. I allowed her to vanish from before my eyes . . . and I tried to forget . . . to blot her out . . . to say that Lena actually did no longer exist."

He paused again. Difficult words these. I did not choose to break the thread of his recital. Painful as it was to listen, I felt that the man must speak. Each word was a relief to his pent up feelings, which he could no longer endure by himself.

"What a fool!" he exclaimed, "oh, what a fool!"

And then he threw back his head and clasped his hands behind his back and strode forward with a new vigor.

"Lena wasn't a mere puppet," he said, "there was more to Lena than I knew anything about."

I nodded without speaking. I had come to believe the truth of that.

"It's a difficult thing to know a beautiful woman," he continued. "One is so satisfied with the mere shell, one does not require that the kernel shall be rich within."

We reached the end of the path and came out into the wide sweep of the park. Knowles paused, hesitating as though he had more to say, and would say it all in the secret enclosure of the trees. Words seem to lose half their meaning spoken in broad spaces. Perhaps that was what he felt.

"Beauty," he said, "oh, beauty is nothing at all. Nothing at all," he reiterated with firmness, as though to impress upon himself something that his heart did not really feel. The very emphasis of his words denied them weight. One can not alter one's whole character at one's immediate desire. "It is only the glaze on life," he said earnestly, "curious how it can satisfy until the surface is scratched."

I wondered was Lena to be ignored, to be left with her poor scarred features, while he played

"NOTHING but a house between us," mused little Jeanie Wren, secretary to Cornelia Harding, novelist, "Nothing but a house, with me on one side and the illustrious Dr. Kerby on the other."

Thereupon Jeanie Wren propped her elbows on her dressing table and stared long at the pert, daring creature looking at her from out the glass.

"What are you going to do about it, Miss Wren?" she asked, "What are you going to do—make the most of living during two whole blissful weeks of Miss Cornelia's absence in remote New York—or—flunk?"

She made a wry little face at herself. "Flunk—indeed," she scoffed, "No you won't, either. Providence didn't give you this chance for nothing—and you simply are going to help out."

The brows knitted in a remarkable frown. Her house—the other house—and Dr. Kerby's house. Dr. Kerby—oh, high anointed celebrity! When Jeanie Wren had been informed by Miss Cornelia that the imposing grey stone abode was the home of the equally imposing Dr. Kerby, and that he was now resting there for one whole month, her little heart went pit-a-pat indeed. Jeanie Wren had always, ever since she could creep perhaps, wanted really to view one celebrity—a man one. In that sense Miss Cornelia Harding did not count. She was one without doubt—a spinster, who knowing so much about the elements of Love, must therefore expound her knowledge in novels. To Jeanie Wren they were little more than a series of sick satisfactions, but being no sort of an authority whatever, she kept her mouth shut and her eyes open—for everything. So with Miss Cornelia's unexpected departure—she saw what she saw—her house—the other house—and his house.

"If it's only one decent, uninterrupted, hour-long look, I'll be satisfied forever," she promised herself alone in the dim hall, immediately after Miss Cornelia's leave taking.

Jeanie Wren wasn't really a foolish, romantic idiot, but one can't live with a novelist for two whole years without becoming—well, tainted. Besides, she was a Wren; that was the best part of her. The Wrens always knew what they knew, and got after what they wanted. And she was proof of her family, for it was, to be sure, their sheer determination that landed her in Miss Cornelia's household. And having landed there, because of the utter necessity of living, she didn't know just how to—"unland."

TWO days had passed—serene—uneventful—since Miss Cornelia's car had honked down the street. So, quite in despair, Miss Jeanie Wren studied her prospects—in the mirror—contemplating deeply. Finally she came, in the course of her contemplation—to her nose.

"It's so outlandish pointed," she moaned, "it's my lost change materialized. Why if I were to follow that—" She stopped plunk in the middle, and gasped, "Why, if I followed that, it might lead me clear to Dr. Kerby himself."

This sudden inspiration brought about a hasty manoeuvring of hair pins, powder puff, and one delicious blue frock. "I'll follow my nose," she said decidedly, as she descended the stairs to dim regions below, "I'll follow no matter where it leads me."

Truthfully speaking, she was almost convinced that it would lead her out on the street—and then up two doors—to his house. Imagine her dismay and her disgust to find herself wandering aimlessly about Miss Cornelia's back yard. She was so mad—so mad that her cheeks grew pink and pinker, and her hair actually stood up—and curled.

Suddenly it came to her over the hedge—the glad, musical laugh of children.

And what do you suppose Jeanie Wren's nose did then? Why—bless me—it led her down on her hands and knees, right through a hole in that selfsame hedge—into the next door back yard!

At first the kiddies—there were three of them—looked rather disturbed and frightened, but not for long. She looked so funny—so ridiculously funny, that they screamed with delight, just to see her coming. Her welcome was unmistakable. She crawled right into the middle of the sand pile and sat there panting.

"I'm Fred," said the biggest of the three without preface, "and she's Doris, and he's Tots. Who are you?"

"Why I am the only Human Story Lady—bless you."

Thereupon there was further exultation, lacking neither in propriety nor originality. In less time than it takes to tell, that Story Lady was busy proving her identity.

So busy they were, and alas, so excited, they did not see the other lady approaching. She came full upon them, and paused. Fred sighted her first.

"Hello Mother," he called, "Say, she's a squelcher," with a most dramatic gesture towards the blue-clad Story Lady.

"Oh—she's—she's—" Doris promptly seconded, with an adoring glance that was more voluminous than words.

The Story Lady sprang up immediately. She was without a doubt horribly confused.

"You know Mrs.—Mrs.—" she began.

"Dickson."

"You know Mrs. Dickson, I am disgraced with a horribly long nose. That's what's the matter; I followed it in here."

hedge crawling," Fred interrupted.

Jeanie Wren colored. "Yes—I did, truly," she admitted, "I couldn't help it, it was my nose. But Miss Harding is away and you know the old saying—'When the cat's away, the mice will play'—"

"Is—is—" another interruption, on the part of Doris—"is Miss Harding a cat—truly?"

There was more laughter.

Doris, six and persistent, was undismayed. "Well—is she?"

Jeanie Wren brushed the sand from her blue skirt.

"She is"—hesitatingly—"She is—well—"

"Sometimes," Mrs. Dickson added, "Oh, I can read minds. Please do come up to the verandah for some tea. Won't your nose lead you that far?"

"Yes—it will," Jeanie Wren said decidedly.

"And you will tell us how you happen to be so alone as to escape the novelist. We were quite surprised to hear she had taken the house next door for the fall and winter. You like it here?"

"I believe I am going to," Jeanie Wren smiled.

And so it was she came to know Alice Dickson and her three.

"If you want to walk into a mother's heart and stay there," she wrote in her memory book that night, "love her children."

It wasn't a hard matter, in fact it was quite the easiest matter ever, to love the little Dicksons. To them she was the wonderful Story Lady, and her coming was—the event. In one week she had known them all forever, mother Alice included. They were very kind to her—those people, and more—she had plenty of living.

IT was one night, one glorious October evening, that she came down from story-telling the children to slumber. Alice Dickson, awaiting her on the verandah, motioned her to a chair.

"Some stories for me sometimes, Lady," she said, "or I shall become disastrously jealous. Tell me a story about your own heart."

Jeanie Wren laughed as she took the low rocker.

"Some children never grow up," she said, "and you are one of them. A story of my own heart. Well—once upon a time"—a long, tense silence, then, suddenly—"Say, do you know Dr. Kerby?"

Alice Dickson smiled.

"We are neighbors," she teased, "so I do know him, to see him."

"Oh—in tones of awe, "Tell me what he looks like?"

"A man."

"You're mean," Jeanie hinted. "And this is the story of my heart, too. Why, ever since I knew the difference between being somebody and being nobody, I have wanted at least one long look at a somebody. I picked on Dr. Kerby when I knew he was so near. It is simply wonderful what he has done for surgery."

"Yes," the other woman acceded, "It is."

"You know—" Jeanie leaned near,

A Sextette of Canadian Women Writers

By OWEN MCGILLICUDDY

CANADIANS are beginning to take a greater interest in their native literature than they ever did in the past. Of course, it is quite true that such writers as Stephen Leacock, Norman Duncan, Sir Gilbert Parker, and Ralph Connor, have always found a large public in the Dominion. Nevertheless, in the last few years, there have been a number of women who have been winning increasing popularity. At the present time there are at least six women whose books are eagerly awaited by the Canadian public. The writers I refer to are Mrs. Emily Murphy, known to the reading world as "Janey Canuck"; Mrs. Grace McLeod Rogers, Mrs. Nellie McClung, Mrs. Evah McKowan, Mrs. Ewan Macdonald, who signs herself "L. M. Montgomery," and Mrs. Isabel Ecclestone Mackay. All of these women are married, the majority of them having children, as well as their literary work, to occupy their attention.

Notwithstanding the many duties of home life, together with community duties assumed in the past few years, this little group have found time to write books and magazine articles and to deliver addresses on a variety of subjects. Wondering how these busy housewives manage to accomplish so much, I was surprised to learn that while their plans and methods of work varied, their one central or guiding purpose was to achieve a certain amount of definite work, no matter what the conditions were. Not one of the six professed to have any leisure worth mentioning, a few of them had hobbies, and their preferences, when they had time to read the works of other writers, were somewhat divergent. In asking them questions concerning their work, I felt that the answers would shed some light on how busy women can do so much and yet find time for other and more diversified endeavors. I was not disappointed.

I discovered that Grace McLeod Rogers plans out all her work before she actually begins it. She told me that she "thinks out" everything first, shaping whole sentences, and often whole paragraphs, in her mind before she begins to write. "I never can properly start my story," she said, "unless I have the ending to suit me, and I generally write out the whole matter twice in long-hand before it is ready to type. I have rarely found time for real leisure because of the demands of family friends, and home, together with outside activities. A holiday away from home is usually for the purpose of an address, or of choosing some quiet spot for writing. As some men would put it—'when I am tired of cutting wood I split rails.' My preference in modern literature is to be found in good poetry and historical matter of all varieties. My hobbies are confined to folk lore and historical buildings with their annals. I also have an old-fashioned flower garden of old-fashioned flowers, which continues to hold my enthusiasm."

Mrs. Rogers has written many historical stories for the "Youth's Companion" under her maiden name of Grace Dean MacLeod. In 1891 she was married to Mr. E. H. W. Rogers, a barrister, who is now Mayor of Amherst, Nova Scotia. During the past season she wrote a novel entitled "Joan at Halfway," which has had a wide sale in Canada, while her successful collaboration with Mrs. George Churchill in the popular "Letters from my Home in India," revealed another side of her literary genius.

MRS. EVAH MCKOWAN, whose book, "Janet of the Kootenay," has been one of the best sellers throughout the Dominion during the past few months, told me that her methods were such that few men would be able to follow them. "I arrange my plots, conversations, and settings," said she, "while going about my morning work in the house and garden and write them down in the afternoon or any other time that I can find. I think that it would be impossible for me to sit down and study out a situation for I seemingly require the accompaniment of physical exertion. When I have all my ideas firmly in my mind I cannot remember whether I have made the beds or dusted the living room unless I go to look. My leisure hours from May to October are all spent playing tennis, with the exception of September, when my husband and I don breeks and spend the month among the wonderful lakes and hills of British Columbia. My idea of a holiday is the following of yellowing trails in the hunting season, pungent with the odor of tamarack and falling leaves. "In literature I prefer wholesome stories of the out-of-doors. It is never necessary for my enjoyment that the hero keeps getting shot or falling over precipices. I am bored by thrilling tales and thrilled by quiet, quaint narratives such as James Lane Allen's 'Kentucky Cardinal' or an account by David Grayson of the making of a stone fence. I have often thought that if a writer has a refreshing viewpoint, too much plot will get in the way of it. My hobbies are my work, three small daughters, sketching, fruit farming, and every outdoor sport that a man enjoys. The big trouble is to get time for it all and I will eagerly join any strike for a forty-four hour day."

Mrs. Ewan Macdonald, who is more generally known throughout the States and Canada as "L. M. Montgomery," told me that she made much use of her note books, in which all kinds of ideas are jotted down for use in characters, incidents, bits of description, and dialogue. "I select all I think will harmonize with or develop my central idea," said she, "and then I build a 'skeleton' of my story or book, blocking out each chapter fully as regards incidents and development of character, with suitable bits of description and dialogue. When the 'skeleton' is finished I begin to write the book and generally do it pretty swiftly. When the story is done I lay it aside for as long as possible, then I read it over, revise, preen, amplify, or correct as may be required. Everything I write receives three such revisions. I work two hours every morning when I am home at actual writing, but collect material all day long by keeping a pencil and note book handy, jotting down everything that occurs to me. So far as leisure or holidays are concerned, if I ever had any I would spend it in reading other people's books or doing fancy work. Any preference I have for modern literature is not worth speaking of. I like the older writers best and history is my favorite."

Mrs. Macdonald published her first novel, "Anne of Green Gables," in 1909, and it achieved an immediate success. Since then she has published "Anne of Avonlea," "Anne of the Island," "Anne's House of Dreams," "Kilmeny of the Orchard," "Chronicles of Avonlea," "The Golden Road."

A Tragedy as Old as the World—An Innocent Man Condemned to Death

What was death, anyway, but a clear-cut adventure? To-morrow, the next day—why let it worry him? He was really through with life!

HIS heart was sick of it. Whatever the verdict was to be, he wished that it was over. He wanted to be away somewhere by himself, away from these men, his jurors, supposed to be his peers, who filed in and out of the courtroom daily like so many wooden-faced destinies, and sat silent or half asleep, their heads glinting in the light from the high window.

He knew life—he had played it from every angle. He had "hit the high spots," too, quite frequently. As a journalist that was part of his scope. But though he had lolled on plush covers often enough to get the feel of them, he never could master sufficient selfishness to deal the deck from that viewpoint. On the other hand, his gift of brilliant satire had left him almost without friends, the sort of friends who could be useful to him, being tried for murder.

He had never been able to suppress his point of view, had never cared to suppress it, perhaps. He had edited for a couple of years a little weekly, all satire. Seeing the uselessness of everything, he laughed. Where was the remedy in a plan which was all greed? He was a cynic—a terrible cynic at thirty-four—and he was tired, tired, tired, so why should it matter what happened? Even love—he was past that, too—another mask! He had been too sensitive to begin with, it might be a little too fine.

NOW his only wish was for them to get it over with and sentence him. It seemed such a useless formality—this jury, the judge quite as listless, and the barking attorneys. There would be only one verdict—the evidence was all against him. Also, because of his writings, he faced strong prejudice. The man who has a propaganda and is able to express it is dangerous. To accept and not to think—has been the unconscious slogan of all time. The world likes its house as convention and rule have laid it out—and not a drop of his blood ran according to rule. But he was only an individual—and many other civilizations had gone before, many, many of them, undoubtedly, that history knew nothing of. And what had come out of them?—merely the present mess. What was the use of single voices in the wilderness? The wilderness were better left to itself.

Perhaps, he had never thought so much as during this trial. And certainly he had never been so much bored as during these last two days. Facing judge and jury for an entire week had brought it out in him. In the beginning he had hoped till he saw it was all against him. Then he had given it up with an ironic smile. What was death anyway but a clear-cut adventure? To-morrow, the next day, or how—why let it worry him? He was really through with life—so why? And though he felt his mental attitude was doing him harm with his judges, he did not change it, nor his manner. Let them all go to it and sentence him quickly. However he fought them they would do it anyway. The scheme of things was theirs, created by minds so constituted—he did not "belong"—so why should he try to remain in it?

On trial for his life, he fell to watching its panorama. And if singing spring days of his youth hit his heart with a breath of the sunshine before he had become a cynic, he drew away from them as he had once drawn away from the light in a woman's eyes that had lied to him likewise.

THEN he fell into spells of wondering what death was like. A strange thing this—not breathing any more! He thought more of it than he thought of his innocence, or what they were doing around him to save or kill him. He was innocent—that was something in consciousness to carry into the unknown, at least. Though the preponderance of the evidence convicted him in the minds of others, it could in no way shadow what he knew within himself.

He had been his own chief witness, telling a simple story. Edmund Travers, the popular actor, had received him, Edgar Matthews, the Thursday morning of the murder at about ten-thirty in his own room in a fashionable hostelry. In the hope that he would produce it he had left one of his plays with Travers just a few days before. He had remained with the actor, who had decided not to use his work, about twenty minutes, discussing its merits. Travers had told him about another play he had taken up, "The Lifted Hand," by another local author. He, Matthews, wondered at him favoring this work because he had seen it produced at a "benefit" by amateurs, and had not thought much of it at the time, though the piece had been very badly acted and his memory was not clear as to essentials. However he had in no way quarreled with the actor, but had taken his own play and gone home.

Half an hour after he left him, Travers had been found by a maid murdered. A very thin stiletto had been plunged into his heart and the room bore all the indications of a scuffle. He had been a favorite with everyone, a man known in his private life to be of a particularly happy disposition, who had everything to live for, and no enemies.

A SCORE of witnesses had been brought. It seemed to him they were overdoing it ridiculously. Two hotel clerks, the maid, a guest at the hotel—all of these knew of the play-troupe's visit. Some people in the lobby, who had seen him pass out, testified that he appeared very nervous and in haste. There was a note he had left for the actor the day previous. Witnesses had been called against the prisoner's general character, and those who acclaimed the fine qualities of the other man. Then, most important of all, there was a rather scathing criticism of this actor written by Matthews about a year before, and which lay on the dresser, a probable cause of dissension, at the time the body was found. This critique, however, had not been half so drastic as articles the prisoner had frequently published on the unfair methods of the District Attorney's office and the wild-weed graft in some other departments.

Further evidence, an absolutely unnecessary mass of it, had been dragged in to show this and that. Everyone seemed so eager to convict him! Understanding what the verdict would be, he had lost interest in it after the first three days.

THE case mostly brought out Travers' extraordinary popularity. The public mind demanded a victim. He let his young attorney fight it out tooth and nail because he was a very ambitious young attorney. But he, himself, sat in contemplation aside watching a tragedy as old as the world repeat itself—an innocent man being condemned to death.

And the crowd that herded in to see the spectacle! Was there really ever any hope for the crowd? In spite of his sympathy for them, what were they? How few of them could think any higher than their stomachs? Poor fools! They owned the world but did not know it and never would. Not even the mess of pottage had they to show for their birthright. The upper and under dog had always been. There must be some fate in it, surely. Where did life journey anyway beyond its glitter? Perhaps that was all. A poppy died and was never seen again. How futile for disciples like himself to teach something the ages, themselves, had failed to teach! The poor would have loved him better had he been able to sing them a simple song, had he been able to catch up their pulse as this actor who had been killed. As young as thirty-four, he had reached, very weary, the barrier of nothingness which enfolds life, and to which the human heart has never found definite answer. He

I AM engaged to Harold—next-door. I suppose it was to be expected! Mother certainly expected it, and father and Harold's mother. Expectation seemed to permeate the atmosphere. So when Harold said something about our having been such jolly good friends and wouldn't it be nice if we got married, I said I, thought it would.

It doesn't seem to be so much Harold himself whom my family find so desirable as Harold's father and his grandfather; in the same way Harold's mother does not rave over me at all but she is more than satisfied with my parents, my grandparents and all my deceased ancestors. It seems that there is such a risk in marrying into families that one doesn't know. Take Mabel Woods, for instance—she married a lawyer from Montreal and it turned out that he had an uncle who committed suicide. Katherine Ripley went to see her the last time she was in Montreal and she asked her, in a tactful way, of course, if she wasn't terribly afraid that Bob might commit suicide too. Mabel said, "I was, at first." Katherine says she did not like to probe further, so we're not sure just what Mabel meant.

I suppose it is a great advantage to know for certain that there are no suicide uncles in Harold's family—although I should never have worried about it myself. The Blakelys have all lived to be frightfully old, all except Harold's father who was killed by accident. Harold is practically guaranteed until seventy-five. Though, as he says himself, the guarantee does not cover the risks of war. It just shows how inconsistent parents are, for with one breath father talks of the healthy and long-lived Blakelys and with the next he declares that the only reason for consenting to my being engaged so young is that Harold's regiment may be sent to the front almost any day now. "Every boy over there should have a girl over here," says father. "A good girl is the best of anchors." But you can see that his ideas are badly mixed.

ALMOST all the girls in our set are engaged or going to be. But I don't think I should have allowed this to hurry me if I hadn't been awfully fond of Harold. I shouldn't think it right to marry a man one doesn't like, not even to be an anchor. Think of sitting opposite to him at breakfast! But I stayed over at the Blakelys one night on purpose to try having breakfast with Harold, and it was all right. Still, although I believe in taking sensible precautions like that, I have lost many of my romantic notions about love. I don't think that I quite believe in love, as love, any more. I think I have passed that stage. And when I look at Edith Williams and Tom White I'm not sorry for it. I should hate to be as silly about Harold as she is about Tom. And Harold admits that the way Tom raves about Edith gives him a pain. No, we have talked it all over and we are agreed that calm liking is the best basis for a happy married life.

Once I thought that no married life could be happy, but that was when I had what Katherine Ripley called the "feminist fever." I think now that my ideas at that time were too radical. The war has certainly shown that, taken collectively, men do play a somewhat prominent part in the scheme of things, however negligible one may find them individually. Even the individual man has begun to seem less negligible. All the girls feel this keenly. They call it realizing the solidarity of the race. And they are going to keep it solid if they can.

Some of them have gone the length of being married already, without bridesmaids or even wedding cake. The war came so unexpectedly, the boys had to go so soon and all the old comfortable world was so shaken and overturned that some of the war brides look dazed and bewildered yet. It was as if some dreadful Thing had suddenly become impatient and said "Hurry!"

AT first Harold wanted our wedding to take place before he leaves, but father wouldn't hear of it. I longed to point out to him how inconsistent this attitude was, but I didn't, because I was afraid he might change it. All things considered, I'd rather wait until we can do the thing properly. I'm quite willing to be engaged and to write to my fiancé twice a week (or whatever is customary) and to send chocolates and cigarettes and socks (mother will help with the socks). And I rather like the idea of being an anchor. But I think that's enough for the present.

Harold's mother is willing to wait also. I think boys' mothers mostly are. In fact, Mrs. Blakely might have wanted the engagement postponed altogether, if it were not for her lively horror of French girls. Mrs. Blakely has never met any French people, but she knows what French novels are! And as for French ancestors—well! So from the picture of Harold with a French bride she turns with real relief to me. Not that I am all that she could wish. I have many faults which time, she hopes, will correct. The chief of them is a certain balanced appreciation of the charms and merits of Harold. Young girls in her time were "more emotional." They did not treat their prospective husbands with "undue flippancy"; they "deferred more to masculine judgment" (Fancy deferring to Harold!) Still, on the whole, Mrs. B. and I get along very well, for she admits that "no one but a mother really knows." And I have promised to leave the knitting of sweaters and Balalaeva helmets entirely to her—they take such ages!

I am very, very busy, so I shan't write in this diary much, but I feel that I ought to note down some of the most important things for, as father says, in these days we are really making history.

THREE weeks later.

Harold is here! He got home from camp on leave three days ago. I ought to have noted it down at once, but everything has been in a rush. Several of the other boys are home too, and everyone is hurrying to entertain them in case their leave should be cut short. Harold brought a friend home with him—Lieutenant Burke—and who should he turn out to be but Jim Burke who used to go to high school with us before his family moved out West.

How boys change as they grow up! And yet there is something very familiar about Lieutenant Burke. I think it is his eyes. The moment I saw him I had a vision of an ugly little boy, with a pompadour which grew on his forehead in a peak, staring and staring at me across the school-room until my neck got stiff with the effort not to notice it. He had no manners at all—as a boy. And he was certainly homely as well as rude. But even then he had remarkable eyes. They were brown and reflected the light just as brown water does. I wonder if he remembers how he used to stare?

LATER.

Yes, he does remember. He hasn't said so—but I know he does. It is just a little bit embarrassing—though I can't quite understand why. I wonder if he ever was really as homely as I used to think? Because in that respect he has certainly changed. No one could call him a handsome man, but he has a very striking face, and he is nearly six feet tall. Harold looks quite little and young beside him, although they are of the same age. I suppose it is his Western life—everything is big out West, he says.

"Including feet," said Katherine Ripley. He laughed. But I did not think the remark at all funny. Men always find Katherine more amusing than we do. Katherine seems to have taken rather a fancy to Lieutenant Burke. She danced seven dances with him last night—in spite of his feet.

I wonder why everybody thinks that engaged people should always dance together—or nearly? The other boys do not ask me half so often as they used to. Luckily Harold can dance!

It was when I was sitting out a dance with him (Lieutenant Burke, I mean) that I felt sure he remembered how rude he used to be. I can't explain—just something in the way he looked! It is odd how some people understand other people, without explanations. It's restful too. I don't believe that Jim and I talked much at all while we sat out that dance, yet we came to know each other quite well by the time it was over and it seemed perfectly natural for us to call each other by our first names as we used to do at school. I am glad because it is so much pleasanter when a bride finds her husband's friends congenial.

Not that I intend to be a bride for ages yet!

NEXT day.

I wish I had a real talent like Katherine. She is making sketches of all the boys who are going overseas, and getting them to autograph the sketches. I told Harold I didn't see why, and he said he didn't either.

"Take me, for instance," he said, "what on earth does she want with an autographed sketch of me?"

I said she couldn't possibly want it really! And it didn't seem to have been a fortunate thing to say, for Harold looked cross. I saw at once that he had liked her wanting it. Men are certainly vain. And Katherine knows how to flatter them. Well, I don't mind, only for Katherine's own sake I hope she will have the good taste to confine her autographed collection to our own home boys. Strangers might misunderstand. Jim Burke, for instance, can hardly be called a home boy, since he has lived for years in Calgary. Besides, one can't know any man well enough in three days to ask him to autograph a sketch. Katherine would surely realize that. I hope so. I think I'll run over there to-night to make sure.

LATER.

Yes, she did ask him! And, naturally, he couldn't refuse. She showed me the sketch. It is one of her best. Either she took more time to it or his face lends itself well to effective work. There is character in the somewhat harsh lines and a certain distinction which is more striking than mere good looks. I told Katherine that I thought it quite a success and well worth having, as a sketch.

She said, "Yes, dear, but as an engaged girl your interest in art for art's sake must be curbed. I have something else for you—something you will like so much better." And she gave me a new sketch of Harold done in crayon—quite good. I was delighted. Colored crayon, however, seems hardly the most happy medium for a soldier's portrait. It seemed to give Harold a—a sort of unbaked look. I asked her if it were quite finished.

"O yes," she said. "I know what you mean, dear. But I felt you would like him just as he really is."

I pretended not to notice the implication, for somehow I was feeling tired. I did not want to argue in defence of Harold. Men shouldn't need argument or defence. And Katherine knows as well as I do that it isn't Harold's fault that his mother has always insisted on treating him like a girl.

I LEFT Katherine's early. Harold was coming to take me home, but I did not wait for him. I wanted to be alone for a while. I have seen such a lot of Harold lately that I am in danger of seeing crooked. I wanted to think—but I didn't get the chance because almost at Katherine's door I ran into Jim Burke and he insisted on walking home with me.

I wish I could remember what we talked about. It seemed rather important at the time, but in looking back I can't fix on anything very outstanding. Conversation is a queer thing. You would think it depended upon what a person says, but it doesn't. Of all that talk I only remember one thing distinctly, and that was a lie. It happened when Jim asked me what was in the roll of paper I was carrying so carefully. I said, "Oh, nothing—just a design for wall-paper." I don't know why I said it. It was an absurd thing to say. And anyway, I believe he knew very well what it really was. I think we talked about the weather after that, or something; then, as it was so early when we got home, Jim came in for a chat with father. Father was out, but I know where he keeps his best cigars, so it didn't matter much. Naturally Jim waited until father came in—that was only polite.

When he had gone I showed Katherine's sketch of Harold to father.

"What d'y' call that?" said father, screwing up his eyes.

"A design for—I mean a sketch of Harold in crayon."

Father said "Hum!" and frowned. Then, as if he couldn't help it, he began to grin.

"It's not supposed to be humorous," I said.

Father's grin vanished.

"Katherine made it," I said. "She is clever, isn't she?"

"Too darned clever!" said father.

He doesn't like Katherine.

NEXT day.

Katherine has an idea. She thinks that everyone ought to be specially cheerful while the boys are home, so she is going to give an old-fashioned picnic. Everyone is to bring her own basket and we are to drive out five miles to the Long Pond. Mr. Ripley is going to arrange for rowboats and Katherine says it's providential that there will be moonlight for the drive home.

I think the idea a good one—if we could all go together in a jolly party. But Katherine's idea is to have everyone pair off. "I know Edith will want Tom, and Janey will want Walter and you, of course, will want every moment you can get with Harold," she told me. "So I've arranged for each couple to drive out and back together."

"I don't want to be selfish," I said. "There are some of the boys who will have no one special to take. If we all went together—"

"Don't worry about that a bit, Lina," she interrupted. "As hostess I'll attend to all that. If anyone has to play odd man out I'll look after him. That is why I'll have no special escort myself. Not being with anyone in particular I can be free for emergencies. All you have to do is to enjoy yourself."

Well, it's her picnic.

But anyone with a social sense can see that she is going about things wrongly. It is a blunder to throw engaged couples together so continually. It is horribly provincial to insist upon the obvious. Besides, even engaged people find variety stimulating.

Katherine ought to remember that—for she was engaged herself once and couldn't stand the monotony. The man was someone she met when taking an art course in New York. He was a painter (portraits), awfully striking. Katherine says. But after a few months she decided that it wouldn't do. Two artists in one family, she said, might result in an over-charged atmosphere.

"Too much art?" I asked.

"No," said Katherine, "too much turpentine."

I don't think people ought to be so careless and frivolous about engagements.

TWO days later.

The picnic is over—thank heaven! I told Katherine I had had a perfectly lovely time and she said that was what she had hoped—she simply loved seeing other people happy. Then we chanced to catch each other's eyes and felt foolish, for we both knew we were lying. If Katherine was happy it wasn't because other people were, and as for me, I never spent a more miserable day in my life.

Harold drove me out, and from the first I could see that there was something wrong. Good temper is Harold's long suit, but anyone more dismal than he on this occasion can hardly be imagined. I couldn't blame him, of course. The uniform cheeriness of our boys in the face of this dreadful war is a thing to wonder at. It is only natural that they should feel let down at times. I tried hard to remember that it was my duty to be cheerful for two. But it only made him worse.

"I'm afraid I'm horribly dull to-day, Lina," he said, after a noticeable silence.

I said it didn't matter. I could quite understand

"Oh, it's not that!" he interrupted quite crossly.

I asked him if he had any idea how soon his regiment would get orders to leave.

He said he hadn't, but he hoped I wouldn't worry if it went sooner than I expected.

I said bravely that I wouldn't worry the least bit and he scowled like anything!

"Mother will," he said in a hollow tone.

I reminded him that his mother was like that. And it didn't please him either.

"All women are like that—if they care enough," he said sulkily.

I saw then that I was on the wrong tack, but I had to stick it out.

"Mothers are different," I declared, and before we knew it we were arguing in the most absurd manner. Harold forgot that he was a young hero and I forgot that I was an anchor and an almost childish quarrel was averted only by our arrival at Long Pond.

Katherine was there already and standing beside her was the "odd man out" the "emergency" for which Katherine had so thoughtfully held herself free, Lieutenant Burke.

"THIS is the commissariat department," said Katherine laughing. "Leave your basket, Lina dear, and dismiss it from your mind. We're not going to bother any of you happy couples with sordid details. You're to have one long, glorious care-free day."

"Thanks," said Harold, rather unexpectedly. "But sordid details are what Lina and I need at present. We'll stay and help."

Katherine smiled kindly. "Poor things," she sympathized. "No wonder your nerves are on edge. But do try to forget about it for an hour or two. Be happy while you can."

"Yes—let's!" I said (there was nothing to do but to play up). "Come along, Harold, I'll race you to the boats!"

I was on my mettle, and I think I did it well. You see, Jim Burke's eyes were on me, and something in that absorbed brown gaze made me hot all over. It brought back the old school room and a rude little boy who stared and a proud little girl who pretended not to know it.

It was the perversity of fate, I suppose, which made me stumble over a tree root as I turned to go.

"Steady!" It was Harold who said it, but it wasn't Harold's hand that caught and held me. It was a larger, firmer hand than his—a hand that felt so—so strange! It is curious, but I never realized before what a difference there is in hands. Even now I cannot understand why there should be such a difference. Perhaps Katherine is right, and my nerves are on edge. Anyway, the fact remains that of all the happenings at the picnic the one thing which I keep remembering is the very odd sensation which came over me when I felt Jim's hand upon my arm.

The only other incident of any importance happened when Harold and I went rowing. I call it important simply because it was puzzling. In reality it was nothing in particular—just a photo which fell out of Harold's pocket as he threw his coat into the boat. It fell face up, and it was the photo of a very pretty girl. A girl I had never seen.

"Who's that, Harold?" I asked idly.

"Oh—just a girl!" He crammed the poor thing back into his pocket in the rudest way. I hope he doesn't think I flatter him by being jealous! I despise jealousy. Harold may keep a dozen girls' photos in his pockets if he wishes.

Still, it was odd.

WE had a rather silent row. I still felt somewhat upset by—by nearly falling over that root, and Harold's temper was atrocious. We cheered up at supper time, but the ride home in the moonlight was anything but gay. Being engaged certainly seems to interfere with conversation. I believe that, in theory, engaged people enjoy silence. But, in practice, I find it distinctly boring. Katherine and Jim Burke talked all the way home. We could hear them. And they seemed to laugh a great deal.

NEXT night.

Mother asked me to-day if I knew anything about Lieutenant Burke's family. As if I could! Besides, what possible concern of ours is the family of a man we scarcely know?

THE day after.

Something is certainly troubling Harold. He is not like himself at all. He has always been such a placid, happy-go-lucky boy, and now he has become a creature of moods. At times he seems almost sentimental, but when I try to accommodate myself to this phase (as I feel is my duty, being engaged) he seems positively uneasy and usually goes home. I know I don't do it very well, but—

What if the trouble hasn't to do with me at all?

What if it's that girl?

The idea seems more and more possible. I am not at all jealous. (That is why I haven't thought of this solution before). But I know he still carries that photo in his pocket; yesterday it fell out, for the third time. I said politely, "Why don't you pin it in?" And he gave me a look—well, it wasn't an engaged look at all!

I think I shall call on Harold's mother. I owe her a call anyway. One of the things she objects to in me is my habit of owing calls. In her day engaged girls thought it a great privilege to run over for a talk with "his" mother. They were simply wrapped up in hearing all about him from infancy upward. And Mrs. Blakely seems to forget that I have known Harold practically from infancy myself. I'm sure we used to call "Goo!" at each other from our respective baby-buggies. And later on—well, I could tell her a few things about Harold if it came to that!

LATER.

The telephone rang just as I was putting on my hat, and it was Mrs. Blakely asking me to do exactly what I was doing. I knew at once that there was something in the wind, for she almost never asks me over. She thinks I ought to come without being asked. I said in a surprised voice that I would come of course if she wanted me.

When I arrived it was more than ever evident that I was wanted for a special purpose. She even forgot to receive me with her usual wondering yet congratulatory air which, being interpreted, might mean "You fortunate, fortunate girl—but what did Harold see in you?" She did not speak about Harold at all for quite five minutes which was, I think, a record, and even then she approached him by stealth, skirmishing, as it were, through the underbrush of minor subjects. Then, seeing that I lent the attacking party no assistance, she suddenly leapt from cover and opened fire.

"Eyehna, my dear," she said, "I do not wish to disturb you, but have you noticed anything peculiar about Harold of late?"

"I don't believe Jim and I talked much at all while we sat out that dance, yet we came to know each other quite well."

"You mean his being so moon?" I asked. "Yes, of course I have—but under the circumstances."

Harold's mother raised a protesting hand.

"By circumstance, you mean the war," she said stiffly. "You do him an injustice. My boy is not fretting about the date before him. It is not that I am his mother and I know."

"Well, then," I said patiently, "what is it?" Not being his mother.

"Of course not. One can hardly expect you to judge too deeply. Yet even you might have seen that his unhappiness springs from within the heart. He is restless, uneasy. In fact, my dear, I am ready to admit that perhaps we older folk were wrong in wishing to make your engagement a long one. For my own part I have decided to withdraw all opposition to a immediate marriage."

She paused and pressed my hand gently. Clearly she expected me to be overcome. I was. But not with the sensations which her expression indicated. "Father will never consent," I stammered at last.

"I will reason with your father," she said gently.

"And Harold isn't keen either?" I blurted it out in desperation—and at once I saw that we were getting to the heart of things. In her anxiety she gave me fear away.

"That's it!" she said. "Harold is—" She saw her mistake and finished hastily. "I mean, I think we were all foolish not to let him follow his first impulse."

I coughed. "Oh, I don't know," I said slowly. "There are others—me, you know. I might not wish to be married as a first impulse."

"Oh, my dear, don't be difficult!" replied Mrs. Blakely. "Harold is devoted to you, of course. You don't understand! I am his mother—"

"Try not to be, just for a moment," I suggested. Look at this from a neutral standpoint. And let us get it clear. You think that Harold is unhappy and you suspect his affections are involved. But now? Is he fretting over the length of his engagement to me or is he fretting because he is engaged to me at all?"

The directness of this issue left us both tongue-tied. We stared at each other silently while our thoughts raced. For myself, I had not taken Harold's change of manner seriously until this moment. But in a flash, as I gazed at her, I saw that she did and she was his mother—and she knew.

"GOOD gracious!" I said with sudden and complete conviction. "Harold is in love with the photograph girl!"

Mrs. Blakely began to cry.

I hardly noticed her. I was too much occupied with my own feelings. How simple the solution was—how blind and stupid I had been! I drew a long breath. It seemed to be the first free breath I had drawn in weeks. Some weight had lifted. I was conscious of a sudden and amazing kindness toward the whole world. Even toward Harold and Harold's mother, who was now searching for her handkerchief.

"I don't see how you can laugh!" she quavered.

"I didn't know that I had laughed, and said so. 'But, dear Mrs. Blakely,' I added, 'if Harold has really changed his mind, if he has met a girl he likes better, you'd rather have me laugh than cry, surely?'"

"It's H-Harold I'm thinking of," wept Harold's mother somewhat superfluously. "W—who is this g-girl? I don't know anything about her—f-family—nothing at all."

"Then you know nothing to its disadvantage at any rate," I comforted. "To me she looks like a very nice girl, though I've only seen her face upside down. Hasn't Harold said anything about her at all?"

Harold, it appeared, had said nothing, and what Mrs. Blakely knew she knew by instinct, not with a little mild espionage on the side. Harold slept with the photograph under his pillow, that much was sure. But, so far, no questions had been asked. Asking questions, his mother thought, might put ideas in his head. As a mother her one instinct had been to blind her eyes to what they might possibly see and to hurry on our marriage so that Harold, the only one worthy of consideration, might be "safe."

The utter recklessness of what she had been prepared to do almost frightened me. Harold and I might so easily have drifted into the inevitable. Even now, instead of relief and gratitude that we had been forced to open our eyes in time, this strange woman felt only bitter resentment at the clarity with which I prepared to resign all claims upon my unhappy fiancé.

"YOUR attitude, Evelina," said she, discarding tears and assuming dignity. "your attitude is entirely incomprehensible. And I must say that I now realize a lack in you which has, no doubt, compelled my dear boy to look elsewhere for—for a more or devotional attachment. Harold has a loving nature, a sensitive soul."

"Perhaps the photograph girl has one too," I said. "We'll hope so anyway. By the way, where is Harold?"

Harold, his mother thought, was out walking with Lieutenant Burke, she wished he weren't. She disapproved of Lieutenant Burke. "A most abrupt young man, Western in manner and inclined to bully Harold—if such a thing were possible."

"Do you suppose Harold has told him about the photograph?" I asked thoughtfully.

Mrs. Blakely's glance became markedly frigid. "Would he be likely to tell a friend what he withheld from his own mother?" she inquired with majesty.

Privately I thought he jolly well would. And if Harold had told Jim, then Jim knew! And if Jim knew—

I left the Blakely's with a casting-off-of-the-dust sensation and right at the gate I ran into Jim Burke. But it wasn't Harold who was with him. It was Katherine Ripley.

NEXT day.

It is such a relief not to be engaged to Harold.

I nearly had hysterics last night when I told mother about it. I began to laugh and cry at the same time. Mother made no comment until I had quieted down. Then she said as quietly as possible: "And now tell me what the real trouble is, my dear."

I was so surprised I just stared. Fancy mother guessing!

"It's Jim, isn't it?" she went on before I had time to get my voice back. The statement was so matter-of-fact that it seemed useless to deny it. Mother went on just as if I had spoken. "Your father and I rather hoped it might be Harold. You always seemed so happy together. But lately I have been doubtful. You were too good friends to be anything else. You know each other too well. Youth likes its spice of the unknown. Still, you would have been safe with Harold, Lina." She sighed. "I think that is why I wanted it so much. Mothers like safety for their daughters."

I murmured something to the effect that I would be all right anyway.

"Yes—I know. And I like Jim, Lina. But," in a musing tone, "one always wonders how these things happen. What did you see in him, dear, or don't you know?"

I whispered that I did not know. Somehow it seemed easy to admit to mother what I had tried so hard to deny to myself. "It's just that he seems different. He is different, there is no one like him here."

"He has a strong personality," said mother. "He is, I think, the type of man who gets what he wants. The question is—"

"The question is—does he want me?" I finished with a shaky laugh.

"Yes." Mother did not try to avoid the issue. "That's the woman's part of it, Lina—uncertainty. I can't help you there."

"There is—Katherine," I murmured.

"There usually is—if a man is worth while. Now you'd better get to sleep. If you don't, you'll be pale and heavy-eyed in the morning and people will say—"

"That I am wearing the willow for Harold!" I added with a giggle.

TWO days later.

I have told Katherine about Harold and I not being engaged any more. It was the simplest way of letting everybody know. But Katherine wasn't nearly as much interested as I had expected. Since I saw her last she has had a big new idea. She is determined to go overseas as an ambulance driver.

"Why not?" she asked when I stared at her. "I can drive anything on wheels. I haven't a nerve in my body and the uniform is perfectly ducky. I tell you, Lina, it's going to be dead-dull around here when all the boys are gone." Then, as if by an afterthought, "as for you and Harold, anybody could see with half an eye that it wouldn't do."

"You mean—"

"I told you what I meant in that crayon sketch I made for you. Don't tell me you didn't understand for I know you did."

"The sketch was a libel," I protested feebly. "though I will admit that I had begun to notice in Harold a certain lack of—"

"Pep," suggested Katherine. "Simply pep. Look at Jim Burke!"

I may have blushed a little. I don't know.

"Ah, I see you have looked at him!" said Katherine with her impish laugh. "So have I. He is the kind of man who gets things done. He is going to help me get my ambulance."

"Very nice of him," I said. Then, suddenly, "Is that what you were talking about so long last night?"

But Katherine was too quick for me.

"Um—partly!" she smiled.

I wish I had a dimple like hers!

TWO days later.

I am utterly miserable! And this is being in love!

I wouldn't believe it, if I didn't know. Nothing else was ever like this. All the other times it was just pleasant and exciting. Now it is a heavy ache that never lifts. And in poems and books and things people seem to like it!

The boys went back to camp yesterday. Their leave was shortened unexpectedly. They do not know when their regiment may get word to go. Even the officers know nothing. I did not see Lieutenant Burke to say good-bye. He had a telegram and had to run for the 12.20 train. Harold left on the 5. We all saw him off and I was glad to see that he was the old jolly Harold of pre-engagement days. He has written to the photograph girl and she has promised to wait. Her family seem all right, so Mrs. Blakely is almost resigned. She has undertaken to be a mother to her and will invite her to visit. The other girls are keen on seeing what she is like. But I can't feel really interested, Harold and all belonging to him seem so unimportant.

I wanted to send a message to Jim. It would have been the friendly thing to do. But somehow I couldn't. Katherine sent dozens. She sent a little package too. I believe it was a photograph.

The town seems absolutely empty!

I asked father if I couldn't go with Katherine as an ambulance driver, and I was obliged to remind him that I am not deaf. Father thinks "No" means more the louder he shouts it.

Well, we shall see!

LATER.

Katherine isn't half bad. She does odd things, and she is a hopeless flirt, but one can't help liking her. She has just been over to bring me three sketches of boys we know who are going to the front. Among them was the picture of Jim Burke.

"I remember you said you liked it—as a sketch," said Katherine, grinning. "And now that Harold has another anchor or there is no

ON THE ROAD

By Will Lisenbee

Out on the road where the wild winds play
With the sea's blue waves and the sand dunes gray,
Where the plaintive call of the shy curlew
Echoes the call of my love to you,
I'll follow you ever, though trails be dim,
To the old earth's distant and farthest rim.

I shall not ask if the road be long,
For love will gladden it with its song;
I shall not tremble if dangers grim
Lurk in the shadowy forest dim;
But gladly I'll brave all dangers dire
To follow the road of my heart's desire.

Out on the road—and just we two,
With night and the stars and a gipsy tent,
And the tossing winds and the ocean blue,
And the red moon up in the firmament!
Night and the sea and the wind-swept dunes,
And all of our cares in a vanished blot;
Night and its dreams and its cryptic runes
And love and life, and the world forgot.

If one studies the magazines devoted to homes and home-making one cannot but feel that, while they do not exactly cater to the man and woman of means, they offer very little that is of practical help to the ones of more limited purse. Of course one does find many helpful suggestions applicable to the most modest establishment, but in the main one realizes that they can be carried out only by those who reckon by dollars rather than by pennies. For those who have as little as I myself to go upon I should like to offer the story of a little bachelor home that has shaped itself into a centre of real domesticity if not of elegance.

I am a professional man blessed with a summer vacation of over three months when everything is going out and nothing coming in. During that time one has to live, and I had grown very tired of camping, visiting, stopping at hotels or summer cottages. I wanted a little place of my own where I could welcome my friends. By a lucky circumstance I heard of a small village on the banks of the Grand River in Ontario. The valley of this stream is notably beautiful, running as it does through a thrifty pastoral country peopled by the earliest Canadian settlers. The village referred to is the haunt of artists and nature-lovers.

In September I registered at the comfortable inn and began my search for a house that could be bought cheap. I first explored a small cottage prettily located and owned by a couple of maiden ladies who had moved away. This proved too small for my needs though the price—one hundred and thirty dollars—was well within my means. Later it was purchased and made very attractive by one of Canada's best-known artists.

Next was I directed to a comfortable little home that cuddled at the foot of a hill beside the mill-race. Across the stream was a beautiful grove of elms, the subject of many a lovely canvas in Canadian art exhibits. Graceful willows drooped into the tranquil waters on whose surface a flock of ducks floated in placid content. Here lived a couple with their adopted son, and as the husband was extremely deaf I opened negotiations with the wife. She did wish to sell. For over twenty years they had lived there, but she found the hill a bit trying. We had found the family in the back garden overlooking the race and were shown into the kitchen. I took one look at the deep windows with their small panes and I knew that my quest was over. I enquired the price and was told I could have the place for four hundred and fifty dollars.

NEARLY an acre of land, a good barn, several plum and apple trees, a good well and a comfortable, roomy dwelling for less than five hundred dollars! Place an advertisement of this kind beside one of those thrilling announcements one sees in many a magazine—"Gentleman's Estate. Modern mansion; seven bathrooms; eighteen rooms; beautifully situated on the Sound in fashionable Westchester County; to be sacrificed at $60,000—and the readers of "The House Beautiful" or "Country Life" would think that the editors had started a joke column.

I was shown through the house which is on the side of a hill, the approach having the appearance of one story while the back presents two. It is over sixty years old the lower story being of stone, the upper of brick. As you enter the front door there is a roomy hall and a closed staircase with flights going both up and down. Above is a well-ventilated attic and below are the dining-room, kitchen, and cellar. On the entrance floor are a living-room, eleven by sixteen and a half feet, and three bedrooms of good size.

Without any preliminaries I agreed to purchase the house at the sum named, although I heard afterward that the party of the first part was prepared to back down to the extent of fifty dollars if pressed. However, if Portia's saying—"He is well paid that is well satisfied"—be true, my benefactress (for I consider her such), must have been well content. And so was I.

Later, when I contemplated the dismantled rooms through which were distributed my own Lares and Penates in packing-cases, my heart did sink for a moment. Most atrocious papers covered the walls—flamboyant reds with arabesque designs in gold; flaring greens with panels of motley hue. The wood-work was painted to imitate oak with a prodigal and intricate grain that would have put Dame Nature to the blush. The floors were worn and uneven. But everything was clean, scrupulously so, and I knew from the reputation of my predecessors that I need fear no lurking habitants of unsavory name and person. I began on the living room by engaging a local contractor, who, for forty-seven dollars built a Merged into tempting Spring evenings.

SUCH talking and laughing, such kissing and hugging, such flurry and excitement should never be allowed in the stately corridors of Macdonald Hall! We wonder what it is all about as we catch fragments of the conversations that are carried on in high-keyed voices to the noisy accompaniment of rolling trunks, of squeaking trunks and desultory unpacking of their jumbled-up contents.

"Why, Mac, it's really you, isn't it? Couldn't you find a man either?" "No, she isn't coming back, changed her mind at the last moment and got married instead." "Remember the girl and the bee-man last year?" "Shall we sit at the same?" "Yes, they have set out on a lifelong honeymoon." "Romance! Can you beat!" and so on, etcetera, ad infinitum.

It is not, however, until the question is asked, "Did you get your entrance pupils through?" that light dawns upon the mind of the interested on-lookers. Pupils! That's the key that opens the door of understanding. One has been witnessing the joyous reunion of the Summer Course girls who have come back to the O.A.C. to can the rest of the agricultural lore that has been held over from the last summer session. Time has been given for the knowledge of the former year to be assimilated or to leak away and now the brain-sealers are once more empty, ready to be filled.

YES, the Summer Course in Agriculture has opened again with an enrollment that far exceeds all previous records. As it is necessary to take this course in two instalments before the coveted certificate is granted by which the teacher is qualified to instruct the children in the art of training their parents to carry on their farming on a more economical and lucrative basis, here we see those of the year before who have not succumbed to nervous prostration or matrimony back at the College, now graduated from the Residence to Macdonald Hall. From their larger experience they feel themselves competent to give information on each and every subject pertaining to the O.A.C. agriculturally or otherwise, to the one hundred and seventy-four raw recruits who have joined the ranks of this redoubtable army.

It is not greatly to be wondered at, therefore, if for the first day or two the second-year student takes upon herself a certain air of superiority which can be acquired only through the knowledge that she is thoroughly versed in the ways of the establishment and stands in awe of nothing. At the Hall, she keeps up an incessant chatter with her dearest friend across the way or calls down the corridor to some stray passer by, while the shy little newcomer, who by some strange chance has managed to get into the Hall, wonders how she is ever going to break into this exclusive family circle where all seem on such intimate terms.

AND while the unacquainted first-year stands in a dizzy bewilderment at the dining-hall door, too timid to venture farther, the second-year student, asked to her last year's pals, calmly goes to the table of her choice. Should the new recruit drift towards this table and find there a vacant chair, she breathes a sigh of relief that she, too, has found a haven of safety.

They may dance to the contentment of the heart and the destruction of the sole.

at the O.A.C.

She has sighed too soon! It was not by accident that this place remained unoccupied. For in front of her are mysterious dishes, their contents hidden from the speculating eye; and out of these the poor uninitiated must serve equal rations to a family of eight. Her hand trembling with responsibility, she serves liberal portions until the first four plates are filled. An electrical something in the atmosphere makes her apprehensive. She feels the starving glares of the unserved trio focused upon her; she looks in dismay upon the diminished contents of the bowls. However will it go around! She heroically resolves to make herself believe that she isn't hungry. Thus early is the spirit of sacrifice developed at the O.A.C.

During the first week, a threatening cloud hangs over the second-year student. Always is she conscious of it, ever does she talk of it, but little has she done to dispel it! This is the dense ignorance that prevails upon "The Winter Reading Course," which consists of the studying of three innocent-looking books containing within their collective pages voluminous information on each and every branch of agriculture. Nothing is forgotten! It is a home-study course and an encyclopedia of agriculture combined.

AS the title suggests, the student is supposed to have devoted her long winter evenings to feasting upon this repast so carefully prepared by learned agriculturists. Unfortunately, as teachers are no exception to the rule that to procrastinate is human, those long winter nights merged into tempting spring evenings, and the books lay untouched. June, the month of the last chance, came and went, and still those books remained unread. At last the time came when they were taken down from the shelf, carefully dusted—and still unopened, were thrown into a trunk to travel down to the O.A.C.

Their day of vengeance has arrived! In return for the neglect they have long endured, they refuse to yield to the desperate, last-minute seeker after knowledge the wisdom of their pages. The more one tries to cram, the less one remembers, until amidst the mental chaos that results, one is driven to exclaim with the poets of old:

Alas, 'tis true
That little I knew
Before these books I read;
But now I confess
That I know still less,
For it's all gone out of my head!

What is the cause of this sudden reformation? Has the student at last seen the folly of her negligence that she so frantically delves into this agricultural lore? A Presbyterian conscience compels us to confess the truth; on the first Saturday of the session an examination is held and the subject is "The Winter Reading Course." Is the mystery solved?

IN order to climb another round in the ladder reaching to the tree of Agricultural Certificates, the student is required to make the acquaintance of at least fifty insects that are considered a menace to society on account of their sharing with mankind the same tastes in food. That she may become more familiar with the said acquaintances, she must murder them, stretch them, mount them, label them and then proceed to learn their life histories. If she is wise, she will have the specimens collected before she goes down to the college, for hard indeed is the lot of the procrastinator. No sooner does the session open, than the pampered of the insect world who have had the fat of the province to feast upon, with uncanny intuition take wing and become voluntary exiles from this home of plenty!

As the time draws near for the specimens to be handed in, desperate measures are taken, and the insect-catcher stops at nothing, resorting even to assault and battery to obtain them. One may be meekly trudging along on a leaf-recognition tramp, when without the slightest warning a tremendous blow upon the back sends her reeling against her neighbors. But anger melts into sympathy when on turning around to investigate the cause of this foul attack, the victim sees the perpetrator forcing a struggling fly into her poison-bottle, and she even summons up a smile as she accepts the murmured apology, "Sorry, but I simply had to have the insect that was on your back; I've only twenty-seven."

NOR are one's troubles at an end, even when one has the required number collected, for unless the dear things are handled with the tenderest care, they have a habit of falling to pieces, rendering themselves valueless. A despicable piece of spite-work. The student who collected hers, or to be correct, had them collected before coming to the College, now doubts the wisdom of her preparedness, as on opening her box she gazes in dismay upon the ruins that meet her eye. The baggage-man is no respecter of trunks, and hers had merely received the usual gentle treatment. As a result, she finds that her carefully mounted collection is now a jumble of bodies, wings, legs and antennae heaped in a corner in an unrecognizable mass. Her first impulse is to throw them out, but it is not an easy task to gather together another half hundred. So bravely she sets to work to reconstruct with mucilage and pins these little creatures made by God and destroyed by man. Out of her necessity she evolves the following formula:

FOUNDATION—ONE BODY.

To one end, the correct one, apply a drop of mucilage, and in this stick a head. Take two antennae of exact length and attach them, one on each side of the aforesaid head, equidistant from the centre. Select a pair of wings from supply on hand. Care should be taken to see that they are of exact coloring and marking. If possible, choose only those belonging to the same species; if not, match as well as supply will admit. With pins fasten the wings to the thorax in such a way that if an imaginary line be drawn from the tip of one to the tip of the other, it will be straight. Lay aside to dry.

If these instructions are carefully followed it is possible to manufacture an insect that is

Spring Ushers in the Lighter Draperies

By EVA NAGEL WOLF

IT is the same old story—as old as Spring itself. Just let the first breath of Spring catch you unawares—or watch the first gay robin tug energetically at the first blind worm and away you'll go to purchase a new hat if you have not already donned one—and on triumphantly entering the living room to surprise the family you'll be struck with its dinginess. You will not be able to wait for the morning to take those dusty draperies down—Ugh! how musty and dingy everything looks—yes, Spring's in the air and before the Spring fever quells this new found energy, let's get those curtains down. —House cleaning, it is the old impulse, as old as Mother Nature.

But there, do not be misled, this is not going to be a diatribe on Spring house cleaning, for no matter how many times you've been told just how to do it—you will do it your own way you know you will. You admit that while the winter draperies are dingy, possibly they will last another season if you care for them properly. Let us take them down carefully, brush them thoroughly, sun them, air them and then put them away. I wonder if you've ever put them away as a certain good old fashioned housewife does. It is true, she has ample store room, but possibly you have also—we don't all live in flats, thank goodness. After her curtains are thoroughly cleaned and aired they are hung up by their own rings on hooks attached to a long, narrow board inside of a white muslin bag as wide as one of the widest curtains. This board is supplied with as many hooks as there are rings to the curtains and all the draperies are stored away in this manner. Of course, any of the various moth preventives may be added. One might use tar bags for storing woolen or velvet curtains. Imagine the joy of knowing that at any minute in the fall, one has but

The famous treatment for blackheads

APPLY hot cloths to the face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough washcloth, work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly, with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear, hot water, then with cold—the colder the better. Finish by rubbing the face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

To remove blackheads already formed, substitute a flesh brush for the washcloth in the treatment above. Then protect the fingers with a handkerchief and press out the blackheads. After a week or ten days of this treatment you will notice how much clearer your complexion has become.

Keep your skin fine in texture

"ASKIN like a child's!"—but do you realize what makes a child's skin so beautiful? More than anything else it is the exquisitely smooth, fine texture which men and women alike so often lose in later life.

You cannot begin too early to arrest this tendency of your skin to become gradually coarser. Examine your face in a strong light. Do the pores seem to be growing enlarged? If so, your skin is not functioning properly—the pores are not contracting and expanding as they should.

To restore your skin to healthy, normal activity and give it back the fine, smooth delicacy it should have, begin tonight to give it this special treatment:

Just before you go to bed, dip your washcloth in very warm water and hold it to your face. Now take a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap, dip it in water, and rub the cake itself over your skin. Leave the slight coating of soap on for a few minutes until your face feels drawn and dry. Then dampen the skin and rub the soap in gently with an upward and outward motion. Rinse your face thoroughly, first in tepid water, then in cold. Whenever possible, finish by rubbing your face with a piece of ice.

The first time you use this treatment it will leave your skin with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. This means that your skin is responding to a more thorough and stimulating kind of cleansing than it has been accustomed to. After a few treatments the drawn feeling will disappear, and your face will emerge from its nightly bath with such a new, healthful sense of softness and smoothness that you cannot help realizing the good this treatment is doing your skin. Use it persistently, and it will bring about a marked improvement in your skin's texture.

Special treatments for each different skin condition are given in the famous booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Get a cake today and begin using your treatment tonight. A 25 cent cake of Woodbury's lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, or for general cleansing use. Sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada.

An oily skin and shiny nose can be corrected. In the booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap you will learn just how to overcome this embarrassing condition.

Don't let ugly blackheads spoil the clearness of your complexion. Read the treatment given above—see how easily you can keep your skin free from them.

THE GHOST HOUSE

A poet tells in colorful prose of how a mountain retreat, where he found a home for many years, may be reached by the wayfaring man.

"It is a small, slab-covered building, very unpretentious."

AT the quiet old town of Catskill, near the Hudson, if you took the June-time journey, you would find that there were still two ways of reaching the delectable mountains, ten or twelve miles to the westward, and the roofs of Twilight half way up the side of High Peak. You could take a train by the narrow, winding little road that would whisk you out in no time to the base of the hills. There, you would transfer to an elevating cable car, which would pull you up a couple of thousand feet on a grade like a toboggan slide, while you watched the earth enlarge and unfold and sink away below you, and finally land you on the roof of the range, deafened a little by the sudden altitude.

If you should prefer, however, you could take the highway, either afoot or in a hired vehicle, and enjoy the serenity of summer to the full, the strong tan of the sun, and the taste of the sweet air on the open road. In that case, after winding among rolling foothills and farm lands occupying the great valley of the Hudson, you would pass through Palenville, a delightful little village lying among its trees, close under the long shadows of the mountains and just at the mouth of the Kaaterskill Clove. From there to the upper levels the road climbs up the canon with a noisy, beautiful, headlong stream for its companion all the way, with walls of green on either side rising sheer and cool, where you may look up through the leaves and see summits of fir and bare, gray ledges towering above you against the blue. This is the front entrance to the Catskills, one of the enchanted portals by which you may leave the clanking workshops of the world for a while and come out into God's green, blue-domed out-of-doors.

AFTER you have followed this road up the Clove for a mile or two you might look up and see ahead of you on a rounded shoulder of High Peak several houses peeping out of the woods. They are the outposts of Twilight, and you have still a long, steep pull to reach them. At one point not far from here I could put you on a trail that would lead up through the hemlocks and bring you out almost under the eaves of the Ghost House itself. But unless you are woodwise you would very likely go astray, and anyhow it is a foolish man who puts sign boards on his own trail. So you would have to stick to the road, cheered now and then by glimpses of Ledge End Inn and your destination looking down on you from above, until you turned in at a gate and found yourself at last in Twilight.

If you followed the lower Ledge Road as it creeps around the side of the Clove you would find yourself in a forest settlement of summer cottages and log cabins hidden away under the trees; and if you held to this road for half a mile or more, you would come to a place where it skirts a precipitous ledge and where you could look down into the beautiful canon, through which you had just toiled upward so laboriously. A little further on there is a path leading off the road on the ravine side and down through a tangle of bushes. If you were to push in there you would discover the top of a crazy flight of steps pretty well overgrown with underbrush, and as you descended cautiously, thinking perhaps you had come on the traces of a buried civilization, you would suddenly spy a roof and gable end through the leafage, and finally at the last step set foot on the piazza of the Ghost House. There is no other way to reach it except by the trail I told you of, and no other point in the world from which it is visible, except my neighbor's porch which you passed on your way in. You may think I ought to cut out my overgrown path and make my steps look a little less like a death-trap. Not for the world.

A CANADIAN SINGER

Bliss Carman, now seeking in California recovery from a severe illness, is one of our most musical poets.

It is a small slab-covered building, very unpretentious, and, like all the Twilight cottages, intended only for summer use, and unplastered. In one corner of the living-room there is an open fireplace of brick, for it is often cool in the mountains even in July, and on many evenings a fire of logs is comfortable as well as companionable. In another corner the stairs go up to three bedrooms above, where you can lie and hear the rain drum on the shingles above your head, or be waked up by the thrushes at the first break of dawn. Under these stairs are a door and other stairs down to the wood-pile and open-air bathroom. As it was built on so steep a site, only the back of the cabin rests against the hillside; the front is ten or twelve feet off the ground. This under space, partly floored, partly bare earth and rock, is only enclosed by slabs set two or three inches apart, letting the air blow through at will and the morning sun come in to keep it fresh and dry. There was no bathroom in the house when I moved in, so here I constructed one. The water pipe runs overhead under the floor of the house, and where it is about seven feet from the ground I had a faucet put in. Under this I laid a piece of flooring four or five feet square, and my bathroom was ready for use. It has neither onyx nor marble nor decorated tiles nor silver fittings; it only cost two or three dollars, but Diana herself could have made no more refreshing toilet in her sylvan stream than you may make here. The vigorous douche comes cold and forceful from our reservoir farther up the wild mountain side; the sun and the wind will be your attendants, the shy woodbirds will make music for you as fine as any private orchestra, and all the serene beauty of the forest morning will be there to sweeten the beginning of your day with courage.

"All the serene beauty of the forest morning."

Bliss Carman, the Canadian poet born in Fredericton, gives a description of the picturesque home where he lived in the Catskill Mountains, near Rip Van Winkle's country.

FROM the piazza you look out through the beech trees which stand immediately about the Ghost House, and see almost nothing but forested hills. You are looking eastward down the ravine; to the left and right are mountain walls, covered with hemlock, beech, maple, chestnut, ash and basswood; the Kaaterskill stream sounds murmurously far below you, in the bottom of the gorge, and your eye is led down along the canon to the top of Palenville at the edge of the great plain of the Hudson.

You would not have half a dozen visitors in the season, except the wood-mice and ground squirrels. You would have all the privacy of the wilderness, and yet all the essential luxuries of town. You could be as solitary as you pleased and yet have plenty of pleasant society for the asking, as soon as you had discovered that Thoreau didn't know everything after all. You would have to make your own bed and build your own fire, but your laundress would come and give the place a thorough Christian cleaning as often as it needed it. If you are like me, your daily routine would be regular, but not inflexible. You would get up early enough to feel the earliness, to taste the freshness and solemnity of the first hours of the day and hear the thrushes at their best. (There are more birds in the woods around the Ghost House than anyone but John Burroughs could name, and nowhere do the thrushes sing more wondrously.) After you had dressed and pattered about a little, and sat on the porch a while, and perhaps done a few strokes of work, you would climb your steps and wander over to the Inn for breakfast. You would be thankful that you had such a clean, quiet, comfortable place to go to, and come back smoking your cigarette, and be ready to work again by nine o'clock. It would probably be about nine, if you ever took the trouble to look at your watch. There you would stay, sticking to your task until one, unless you wanted to climb High Peak or walk over to Palenville Overlook by way of Wildcat Ravine. After dinner you would have time to answer your letters and then about three or four you would probably go for a long walk getting home for supper at six. In the evening you would be likely to visit your neighbors for a bit of a chat or perhaps some good music or reading. You would carry your own lantern with you to light you over the stones and roots of the dark wood paths and to keep you out of the mud when it was wet. It does not aim to be the simple life, you see; it is only simplified to a certain extent, in certain directions, to suit your particular needs and preferences. One may enjoy camping out for its own sake, and there is an unquestionable zest in getting back to nature, as we call it. But that does not prove that

They end corns now in this scientific way

People who know—millions of them—now end all corns in this way.

They apply Blue-jay, either in liquid or in plaster form. It means but a touch and it takes but a jiffy.

The corn pain stops. Then the Blue-jay gently undermines the corn so it loosens and comes out.

The modern way

Blue-jay was invented by a chemist who studied corns.

It is made by a laboratory of world-wide repute.

Old-time treatments were harsh and inefficient. Blue-jay is gentle, quick and sure.

Now all corns are needless. All these pains can be avoided. To let corns remain while you pare and pad them is folly.

You can stop a corn ache the moment it appears. You can end a corn completely before it can develop.

Blue-jay has proved these facts to millions. It will prove them to you—and tonight—if you let it.

Quit the old methods of dealing with corns and see what this new way means. Your druggist sells Blue-jay.

Further Adventures With Our Young Friends THE PRESTONS

By MARY HEATON VORSE

CHAPTER LX.

THERE are times when all one's children worry one all at once. I had Edith and Osborn to think of and had also been sure for some time that there had been influences at work in Jimmie's life about which I knew nothing; and yet I had little enough to go on to support this theory—nothing but a subtle change in Jimmie's manner, a few intonations of speech whose origin I couldn't trace, and the fact that he was getting harder to keep at home, which I couldn't but admit was natural for a boy of his age. Still, little as appeared to the eye, I was sure that there was some unknown element moulding him, and it is the unknown element in a child, for which no mother can account, that worries her. It is a bad day for her when she realises that any casual outsider may upset her training; may count for more in the life of her child than all her influence can possibly do.

I was wandering along this train of thought instead of getting ready for a tea-party for Osborn that afternoon, when my reverie was broken into by a little boy. He was indescribably foreign. His straight black hair hung about his eyes. As I looked at him he glittered enormous black eyes at me. "What do you want?" I asked him.

In a wheedling tone he replied: "Jimmie."

"Jimmie isn't here," I said. "Do you want to wait?"

"No," he answered and would have been off. I would have been glad to keep him. I wanted to know more about the wheedling tone.

"You are not an American?" I asked him.

"Oh, yes," he answered, "but my father is out of Hungary." Then, with a dexterity unknown to the Anglo-Saxon child, he eluded me.

I went out to the kitchen where Seraphy was grumbling about Dobles and Edith's young men and, as I paid no attention to her confused mumblings, she concluded:

"An' talkin' of limbs, th' worst o' th' kit an' bilin' of 'em's settin' there at this blessed minit."

I looked out of the window. There sat the child who had been looking for Jimmie. He flashed at me a dazzling smile in recognition.

The guests had just arrived when Seraphy came to me saying in a stage whisper:

"Ain't it enough, Mis' Preston, that I got a tea-party on me hands without me bein' stung to death!"

"Stung to death?" I asked.

"Yes'm: that's what I said. Jimmie an' that black-hearted Finsky boy's got th' hose turned on a bees' nest. 'Get out o' here!' says I to 'em. 'You're drivin' the bees in on me.' 'O, beware the bees,' says Jimmie, laughin', an' the other don't say nothin'—it's th' unchancy, glancin' eye o' him I can't abide. So I cum right up to you, Mis' Preston—an' Osborn an' his friends waitin' f'r tea on the piazz! It's no day f'r me to get all stung up!"

I went down and stopped the boys. I had only to look at Finsky to realize that peace had fled. His eyes glittered; he looked the spirit of uncontrollable mischief—and Jimmie, standing by, looked like a capable head to carry out the spirit's desires.

Everything was going well. The young people were dancing. Edith with Owen Greate, when all of a sudden there was a whish-s-sh from the hose, a noise of the angry humming of hornets as a crowd of the angry insects stormed down on us, driven from their home by the well-directed spray. Then I beheld a singular little incident. There was a sudden stampede.

Edith and Owen stopped dancing. They looked at each other as though measuring one another's pluck. I knew that in the back of Edith's head lay the idea—"I will not let Jimmie spoil this dance." They smiled at each other and kept on dancing alone on the piazza, invulnerable, the hornets buzzing about them.

I could see an expression of interest and admiration in Owen's eyes, different from his former placid friendliness. He looked at Edith as though he had never seen her before and she flushed under his gaze. Every one else had run nimbly around the side of the house. I saw Osborn clap his hand to his mouth with a muttered exclamation, while one of the girls cried:

"Is any one stung?" at the same time muffled and derisive laughter came to our ears.

"No one but me, luckily," responded Osborn, taking his hand from his mouth, which even in this short time had swelled dreadfully, giving his face such a grotesque appearance that Berenice burst out laughing and apologized for it in the same breath. It was this laugh which was accountable for that which happened next, for between the bushes gleamed the face of the Finsky boy. Seeing him, Osborn sprang to the piazza rail, caught him and, turning him over his knee, spanked him soundly with his hard, athletic hand. He stood there imposing and dignified, head of the tribe—a boy used by his position as captain of the ball team to command others, and yet with his mouth swelled to such a terrific size his dignity sat oddly upon him. Laughter rippled among the girls, suppressed at first, then louder, and at last a great burst of it, Berenice's voice dominating it.

The task of entertaining the tea-party fell on Edith, which she did as though she were an experienced hand. It was a successful party; there was a spirit of gaiety in it: the barriers were down. Every one enjoyed it but poor Osborn, whose troubles were not yet over.

Before the guests had left there came a ring at the front door. A huge man, attended by what we call in our town the constable, presented himself. His black hair hung over his ears; his black glittering eyes flashed fire. It was the father of the Finsky boy.

I will not attempt to give the dialect in which he recited his wrongs. The substance of it was that he had a boy who, since he had met Jimmie, was a devil; but devil or angel, he was living in a free country, and if there was any spanking to be done, he proposed to do it himself.

"Ma'am," he finished, "that Jimmie is a bad boy. You spank him every day for long, maybe he get better."

Osborn was back by supper time. "They fined me five dollars," he said.

Seraphy was hovering around the table. "Five dollars, is it?" said she. "Five dollars is all! Had I known it was only five dollars it cost, 'tis th' grand lambastin' that limb of Satan would have got off me long ago—him pullin' Jimmie into all sorts of mischief!"

"Let me tell you," said Osborn, turning to Jimmie, "if you ever spoil one of Edith's or my parties again it'll be the worse for you, young man. Spanking you won't cost five dollars! I've a good mind to do it, anyway."

"Oh, let bygones be bygones," said Edith. "You'd not be nearly so mad if some one else had got stung. Every one but you had a good time. It broke the ice." There was a heightened color to her cheeks, a gallant carriage to her head; she had all the triumph of having gotten away with a difficult situation and also of having established her friendship with Owen, since she had pluck and resourcefulness. I went to bed meditating on the strange ways of Providence who, through the devilry of an Hungarian boy, had given Edith the chance of showing her mettle.

CHAPTER LX.

MEANWHILE, the intimacy between Edith and Berenice grew and those hours when Osborn was not at her house, Berenice was at ours, she, like other young ladies, interesting herself in my flower garden. Nor did my detached air when she approached make the slightest impression on her. It was

ADAM may have begun his career as a gardener—but he probably spent some of his time as a worker in wood, in however primitive a fashion, before his earthly life was ended. The attraction of the work is natural to all sons of Adam, as is evidenced by the whittling practised by the small boy. The writer, who planned the series of articles on home training in cabinet work, as announced in our May number, says:

Although the boys of to-day are to be the men of to-morrow, there are many grown-ups whom I hope to interest in these practical talks illustrated with drawings and working plans as object lessons that can be utilized by any boy or man, who wishes to do something with his own hands and head, and to learn how to do things right by beginning right.

Country-born on a small farm, where most of the land was yet heavily timbered, I found myself at the age of twelve called upon to do all kinds of farm work in the summer, and to chop wood and draw it to the nearest market in the winter. With few aids other than natural resources we were obliged to depend upon ourselves for the commonest needs and comforts of life. Under such conditions we could only think of making the necessary things in the most primitive and practical way. If we needed an axe-helve, an ox-yoke, a pair of bob-sleds or a pork barrel, we had to make them by hand; and in many cases we had even to make our own tools. These things were made in a direct and substantial manner without any thought of ornament; and yet as I look back I can see that we worked out many beautiful shapes, especially in axe-helves and ox-yokes.

After many years and long experience I am free to own there was a deeper satisfaction in working out these simple forms which were put to practical use, than has come in later years from articles made for the exacting demands of modern taste. And so this thought comes up: When we come to make things ourselves and because they are needed, instead of depending upon the department store to furnish them, we shall not only find pleasure in making them, but we shall also take more pleasure in possessing them.

In referring so frankly to my boyhood and experience, I do not forget that conditions have changed since then, and that I am addressing a later generation and many boys who are not compelled to work for a living so early in life, and are denied the privilege of earning by manual labor their own food, clothing and shelter, or to help to earn the comforts of life for the dear ones of the family. While it is not necessary to return to primitive conditions of living, which demand that things shall be made to fit them, yet we can begin with primitive forms, which is always safe. In starting this way we begin right and have the structural instead of the non-structural always before us.

MANY of the boys I hope to be able to interest and to persuade to learn how to do things for themselves, or for others, are those who are not driven by necessity to labor with their own hands, but who will, I trust, take up this work from choice, as many of their elders have done, who are not craftsmen by trade. These professional men and others find pleasure and relaxation during leisure hours in building something useful or working out some original notion, in that friendliest and most natural material that Nature has given to man for his shelter, and which enters so largely into the comforts and conveniences of the home.

The world has never found any substitute for wood in its many utilities and its natural beauty.

THE TOOL CABINET

Time and the forces of Nature have wrought out the many wonderful fibers and textures, and the almost endless variety of beautiful traceries in the grains and the interesting age-mark rings which keep the record of the birthdays of the forest trees.

Tools, few or many, you must have, and various sizes of tool cabinets are made and furnished at varying prices. The work bench you will also need to buy, for you can not build it as it should be built for service, and the one shown is specially manufactured for the purpose. Each of the object illustrations is accompanied by brief but clear instructions, with working drawings and a mill bill. The latter is made out the same as for factory use, and if taken to the lumber manufacturer the materials can be all obtained cut to measure in the rough. Then with a little study, and the necessary tools, you will be ready to begin your part as a builder, selecting whichever article suits you best.

DESIGN FOR A BIRD HOUSE

SECTION SHOWING V JOINT

DURING the last ten years, bird houses have become common throughout Canada and it is hoped that many of our readers possess more than one of these "summer residences" for the birds. Those with rustic finish are highly popular and are easily made. The birds which take shelter there look more at home than those who are in more ornate dwellings. A bird house more than pays for the time and trouble in its construction, when you take a real interest in the cheerful little tenants. Even the birds have a housing problem of their own and you can make Jenny Wren or the Robin Family happy by providing them with a cosy corner—and incidentally add to your list of friends.

There is now an interest taken in our birds greater than any known before. There are various bird societies which have for their object the preservation and protection of our birds; and their work becomes of more varied interest with every passing year. Down in the southernmost county of Ontario, the pleasant land of Essex, there is to be found the bird sanctuary where Jack Miner cares for hundreds of birds, which find happiness and safety in a real home for our feathered friends. Mr. Miner is writing a book which will probably be of enthralling interest, for what he can tell you about all manner of feathered folk will be worth knowing.

Now, it is not given to all of us to have a large estate or to establish a bird sanctuary, but most of us have a garden which can hold a bird house.

where the aforesaid wren may find a comfortable abode or where Master Robin may pose majestically on a tiny verandah. There may be constructed a house for the woodpecker, that is as cheerful a lodger as you can have in your bird house. As the Toronto S. P. C. S. says: "Be kind to animals—you are one yourself."

BIRD HOUSE

IN building the bird house there is little to note, as everything is very plainly shown on the working drawings. A good line for the bracket will add much to the interest of the piece. The back is fastened in with brads and a small brad through the perch will hold it in its place.

no surprise to me to come in and find her seated beside Maria, appealing eyes raised to her, while Maria taught her the new stitch of Italian embroidery.

Osborn's state of mind, too, was obvious to me. Falling in love affects people in different ways. Some become morose and disagreeable, but this experience has always had an exhilarating effect upon Osborn; he gets more and more high-spirited and swings along as if he owned the world. As Seraphy says, "You can tell just be the set of Osborn's coat when he's got a new girl."

Then suddenly Osborn's mood changed. He sat around gloomily. I wondered if Berenice was treating him badly. For a week he was sunk in gloom, then one day he came to my room and fidgeted around the way he does when he has something on his mind.

"We licked 'em to-day," he announced. Then he shifted on his other foot.

I replied that I was very glad of that, and waited.

"I guess it's going to be a good day for practice to-morrow," he went on.

I replied it looked like it, and still waited. Ever since he has been a little boy he has always approached anything he had to tell me in this embarrassed way, and he seemed to me no older than he was at six years when he would talk of irrelevant things and then make a final rush and come to the point. So any mother can imagine my feelings, when, with a gulp, what he had to tell me finally came.

"Mother," he said, "I want you to know before anybody else, and I know you'll be glad, you are such good friends—I'm—engaged—I'm engaged to Berenice Doble. I—I know I'm k-kind of young and all that sort of thing—" He seemed far from happy; rather as though he heard his own words with deep disbelief.

But here I am glad to say I had good sense enough to put my arms around him and kiss him. Then I sat down and talked to him. I told him that marriage was a very serious thing and lasted a long time, and that I thought Berenice was a sweet, dear girl—and I suppose she is, for those who like her—and that I thought, too, he would agree with me that it would be better to keep the engagement a secret for a while anyway. By all of which you can see that I was working for time. Then I went up to my room and locked myself in and had a good cry.

My Osborn engaged to that bird-shooting, trout-fishing minx! I saw Mr. and Mrs. Doble seated at our family table. I saw all the other Dobles over-running us, and I thanked God that Osborn was only a freshman in college, and unless I opposed them and they ran away, that he would have plenty of time in which to get over it. Oh, I wished at that moment that we lived in some enlightened country where children have to ask their parents' consent about getting married, and where it isn't so fatally easy for young people to see each other! I was just drying my eyes and putting my hair straight when a knock came on my door and our second girl announced: "It's Mrs. Doble."

I went down to the drawing-room and found Berenice's mother seated there. She is a large, placid woman, and has none of the sporting tastes of her daughter or her husband. Her round face has always made me think of a pie just ready for the oven. She was dressed in a princess gown, which displayed all her ample curves to advantage and wore a perfectly fresh pair of white kid gloves. Upon her hat rested bunches of cherries that must have been made after the design of Mr. Burbank's most approved model.

"Mrs. Preston," said she, "I'm not going to do any beating round the bush, and I'm not going to pretend that I haven't come for what I've come to talk about! I don't know if Osborn's told you, but if he hasn't, it's time somebody did. Him and—oh, Mrs. Preston, him and my Berenice have gotten engaged! I tell you when Berenice told me it knocked me all of a heap! I never did approve of your son's coming to my house like he's been doing—but, there, you know what young folks are and I didn't put my foot in it.

"And, then, there was that dog! For the land's sake, I've said to Berenice a million times, if I have once, 'make Osborn Preston stop bringing that dog to my house!' Why, Mrs. Preston, I'm fairly et out of house and home, what with Mr. Doble's dogs and all. I like a dog as well as anybody, but I like a dog in its proper place, and that setter dog of Osborn's hain't any idea what the proper place for a dog is.

"I don't know if you know it, but I do, that when he's home and in college with Osborn he sleeps on the foot of Osborn's bed, and I'll tell you I know it—by tracks of muddy paws I've found on Berenice's bed. I never seen such a dog for impudence! You'd think he had a mortgage on my house to see him come runnin' in. Mr. Doble's dogs is bad enough, but we've got kennels for them. And I wouldn't talk so much about him if he wasn't at the bottom of it all. If Osborn hadn't ever brought him to our house, there wouldn't be all this goin's on.

"Now, Mrs. Preston, I haven't anything to say against Osborn. Osborn is a perfect gentleman; and I'm not saying anything against you, Mrs. Preston, but the thing the matter with Osborn is the way he has been brought up."

To this astonishing statement I found very little to say. I murmured something, but it did not stop my visitor's oratory. She had stopped a moment, evidently preparing for the battle, but as she saw no signs of anger in my eye, but only bewilderment, she said more softly:

"I suppose I might have put that different—but, there, that's me all over! When I think a thing I come right out with it. Your family's worldly, Mrs. Preston! I don't mean but what you ain't fine pay customers, nor that I've got anything against you, but we don't think the same things. Osborn hasn't got principles like my young people! He dances, he plays cards, and it's driven me near crazy to see my Berenice going round with a young man no matter what his manners are, who hasn't no more consideration for Sunday than Osborn has.

"It's just about broke my heart and it just come at an awful time, for I don't know whether you noticed it or not, but our minister is certainly taken with Berenice,—and Berenice takin' up with your Osborn! That's what comes of letting girls be brought up like they were boys! But Mr. Doble he wouldn't ever listen to any reason from me, take Berenice along he would from the very first, though he's as strict principled a Baptist as ever stepped in every other kind of way. He always says to me, 'Birdie, there ain't nothing in the church against a girl going shooting with her pa.' 'No,' says I, 'because there's never needed to be no such thing. Who ever heard of a girl going shooting, George Doble?' I said to him.

"But you know what men is! Now he can blame himself, for in every other kind of way Berenice would make a splendid minister's wife, brought up strict like she has been. Besides, what a girl like Berenice needs is a quiet husband, because—though you mightn't think it, she's got an awful strong will, she's got a will just like her pa!

"It complicates family life awful to have a girl take just after her pa and not after her mother one bit. She never took after me in nothing except her little ways. When I was young I had little ways just like Berenice, but with a growin' family you can't have 'em any more'n any other kind of frills, and the only ray of light I've seen in this, Mrs. Preston, is that I knew you'd be just as down on it as I was. There's no mother living wants her son engaged when he's just in college, no matter how nice the girl is.

"Now, I'll tell you, Mrs. Preston, don't antagonize 'em. If you antagonize Berenice, she'll be so set on Osborn that a pickaxe wouldn't get her off—but just leave her lay, and like's not she'll get tired of him, which is what I'm hoping and praying for."

"That," I said, with dignity, "is just what I have been hoping and is seemed to be they looked for nothing disturbing as they again took their way along the highroad.

But this was the Province of the Unexpected, and they should have remembered.
There was a large bush on either side of the pathway, and each, to Diddy's surprise, was laden with blue roses. From under the bushes there suddenly appeared four strange little beings, who stood in a row across the road, barring the way. The odd four were all letter-men, and each had a cute little curl standing up on the top of his head.

As the travellers approached, the letter-men greeted them with a chorus of questions.
Diddy Happen could make out the words—who?—what?— how?—why? The little fellows talked so fast that there was no time to answer even one of them, and as they blocked the way, there was nothing to do but to stop and listen.

The letter-men kept right on asking their one-word questions, until it seemed as if Diddy and his friend would be unable to continue their journey. But help was at hand.

A new figure jumped down from one of the big blue roses, right in front of the noisy four,
and said, "What?"

He was a letter-man, too, and his name was AID.

"One at a time, now," said newcomer.

Then each of the letter-men asked his question in turn, and old Dedder Naherrin answered them all.

"Who?" asked the first one.
"A band of pilgrims," replied Dedder.

"What?" asked the second.

"That takes the same answer," said Dedder, and the letter-men looked disappointed.

"How?" questioned the third.

"Walking most of the way," said old Dedder Naherrin, as he thought of the ride on the Wish-Horses.

"Why?" asked the last of the letter-men.

Dedder Naherrin thought a moment, then he replied:

"A band of pilgrims on a journey, because every one must travel the road of the long year."

The Aid had hopped up on his blue rose again, but where he had been there suddenly appeared a very curly letterman, who shouted, "Go!"

The four question-men ran back under the rose bushes, where the Go followed them.

The road was now clear, and Diddy and his friends went on their way.

A loud humming was heard, and for a moment the Tick Tock brothers were afraid their clocks were running down.
They soon saw, however, a gigantic beetle flying toward them, and the humming of its wings grew louder and louder.
It alighted close to Diddy Happen, and as soon as it had folded its wings, started singing in a booming voice—

Of all the months that round the year,
If you but listen, you may hear,
There is but one some wish would stay—
The merry madcap—dancing
May.

And there are some who love
the days
Through which the sunshine ever plays;
While fleecy clouds against the sky
Make a dream-world of fair July.

Though all May beauties I can see,
And fair July—the best to me,
In dawn or twilight, night or noon,
Is lovely, rose-crowned, laughing June.

"So you are a June bug," said Diddy.

WHO

How

Go.

Dedder Naherrin quickly.

There was plenty of room on the great June Bug's back for all the travellers, and when they were seated comfortably, the Bug flier spread his wings and rose in the air.

It was a wonderful trip, particularly for the little If, who fell off, and being caught in his fall by one of the bug's long legs, finished the trip suspended by his curly tail.

They passed swiftly over a country that seemed made up of nothing but fields of flowers.
There was a softness in the air, that the June Bug said was caused by the sweetness of the summertime.

When they were high in the air, they came upon a swarm of fliers, letter-men with wings, who, Dedder Naherrin said, were the Ups, and never found near the ground.

The June Bug carried the travellers far upon their journey, until, at last, they could see dimly the end of the June road. A little further, and their flying-steed descended so that they might land near the beginning of the next stage of their journey.

In front of them was the July road, and marking it stood a large, square, white stone, on which were the words July 1st,
Dominion Day. Planted in the top of the stone was a tall flagstaff, from the top of which floated a large Union Jack.

This was a joyous day that they were coming to, and as he saw the flag, Diddy sang in his clear, boyish voice:

The flag that's waved a thousand years

Is just the flag for me.

I love the land it floats above—

Fair Canada the free.

It's honor bright, home love

THE GHOST HOUSE

we should live perpetually under canvas. Everybody who has tried it knows that in our climate a tent is almost as comfortless a dwelling as can be devised. It will not necessarily expedite the writing of your novel to spend three or four hours a day cooking your own food and washing your own dishes, nor will it inevitably increase your aesthetic appreciation of nature to sleep out in the rain, though a fair amount of rough life is undoubtedly wholesome and tonic. It is useless to ask men of the twentieth century to live the life of the twelfth, or of the Stone Age.
We are more complex in our nature than the people of those times and our life must be more complicated. On the other hand it is undoubtedly true that we surround ourselves with a lot of complications and complexities that are only hindrances to our freedom and development and happiness. It is good to get rid of these unnecessary things, but every man must determine the limit of simplification for himself. It is perfection, not simplicity, that must be our aim; and perfection in life as in art, is attained only gradually by eliminating all that is unhelpful and unessential, and retaining only what is indispensable for the beautifying of our daily lives, the increasing of our intelligence, and the strengthening and ennobling of our hearts. It follows that we will cast aside many experimental ideals in the process,— ideals not necessarily wrong in themselves, but partial and imperfect.

June Mornings

Bubble Grains on berries

Mix these airy, flimsy bubbles in every dish of berries. Use Puffed Rice. The blend is delightful. It adds what crust adds to a short-cake.

At breakfast, also, serve with cream and sugar — any of these fragile, fascinating grains.

June Evenings

Whole wheat steam exploded

For suppers, float
Puffed Wheat in milk.
That means whole wheat with every food cell blasted. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size.

They seem like tidbits, but every flaky globule is a grain of wheat made easy to digest.

June Afternoons

Airy, nut-like confections

For hungry children, crisp and douse with melted butter. Then Puffed Grains become nut-like confections, to be eaten like peanuts or popcorn.

Use also like nut-meats as a garnish on ice cream. Use as wafers in your soups.

Puffed Wheat

Whole Grains, Steam Exploded
Puffed to 8 Times Normal Size

Puffed Rice

Prof. Anderson's creations

In Puffed Grains every food cell is blasted by a steam explosion. A hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel.
Thus digestion is made easy and complete. Every atom feeds.

The grains are toasted, crisp and flimsy. They taste like nut-meats puffed. Never were grain foods made so inviting.

But remember the great fact. Every element is fitted to digest. They are ideal grain foods which never tax the stomach.

In summer, serve at all hours, and in plenty. Keep both kinds on hand.

Like nut meats on ice cream

These flimsy grains taste like nut-meats puffed. Use them also in home cake-making.

FRECKLES

Now is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it every morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.—Adv.

June, the Month of Roses, Weddings and School Closings

TO quote our friend the Walrus, the time has come to speak of many things, and June seems to present quite as diverse a collection as the sealing-wax, cabbages, and kings of legendary lore. Their importance is more or less relative, of course. To the lover of flowers June roses come first on the list; to the perennially romantic and to those about to be married weddings monopolize earth and air and sky—particularly the sky, for their thoughts are far above the mundane things of life; to those who have played the principal part in a June wedding there follows in a very natural and fitting sequence the momentous fact of school closings. They all appeal to me. I love the masses of pink and cream and red that border my garden paths; I love the sight of a slight graceful maid as, clad in her gown of shimmering silk, enveloped in a mist of tulle, she marches slowly up the aisle to the strains of Lohengrin; I love the rapturous call of my boys as they dash into the house hurling their books to the darkest corner of the closet reserved for them, chanting "No more Latin, no more French, no more sitting on a hard board bench." There is another which rhymes "Greek" with "teachers on the sneak," but as this is rather hard on those patient souls who are the ill-paid foster-parents of our children and who have to bear their idiosyncrasies for the greater part of the day, I rather discourage the sentiment. Anyway, they don't mean it!

First of all come the roses. Who can resist the brazen scarlet of the climbing American Beauty as it peers in at one's window or hangs enticingly above one's porch? Who will not go into raptures over the rosy coral-pink of Maman Cochet, as she smiles at one from one's bed of tea roses? Who can be indifferent to the Snow Queen, white and pure; to that frankly ambitious climber, Dorothy Perkins; or to the hardy General Jaqueminot? And who can say which is the loveliest among them all?

Then as to weddings! On this subject there is surely nothing new that can be said. All the world loves a lover and I suppose that half of it loves a wedding. June has always been accepted as the month par excellence for marrying and giving in marriage. For reasons best known to myself and one other—he is at present fixing some netting for my sweet peas and using language that is not fit for the children to hear—I prefer October. But that is a matter purely personal. My feelings as regards these affairs are somewhat mixed but as a rule I feel much more like crying than laughing. A wedding is such a tremendously momentous affair and marriage is something, as the prayer-book says, not to be entered into unadvisedly or lightly, but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God. And yet how many come to grief because they fail to realize the stupendous significance of the step they are about to take!

UNDOUBTEDLY there is a glamour about a wedding that appeals to all save the disillusioned or the moribund. All the feverish preparation of trousseau and household linen, the showers before marriage and the long array of bridal presents arranged for the admiration or criticism of the guests; the Day of Days itself with the swift comings and goings, the plottings, the smiles, the tears; the ride to the church with one's father and the return with one's brand new husband—all these are certainly a large factor in the lives of two young people who are embarking upon a long and somewhat perilous journey.

Then comes the honeymoon, when all that is familiar and commonplace is left behind and the bride and groom fare forth alone for a fortnight or more in which they will see each other pretty regularly and have an opportunity of becoming really well acquainted! It is said that no two people know each other thoroughly until they have spent a winter and a summer together. Unfortunately this is a test which can scarcely be tried as a pre-nuptial caution unless one wishes to meet with raised eyebrows and averted glances. No, the experiment is positively forbidden and one has to take a long chance and pray that all will be well.

And after the honeymoon? The homecoming to a little nest which is frightfully clean and unused, with its shiny furniture, its fresh hangings, its gleaming silver and dainty bric-a-brac. They feel a delightful sense of proprietorship and importance, these two, and as soon as possible they invite some of their closest friends to a meal prepared in the ménage by the little mistress herself or by a portentous female in the kitchen of whom she stands in mortal terror. And such a meal, with monsieur and madame doing the honors as if they had been entertaining for many moons, trying to look unconcerned and to act as if the successful engineering of a dinner-party is as simple as brewing a cup of afternoon tea.

And then the novelty begins to wear off a little. They are just as fond of each other, of course. Edward is a dear and Julia is just the sweetest little wife in the whole wide world. Comes the first quarrel—it is bound to come, friends, when skies turn suddenly dark, the sun ceases to shine, home seems like a dear far-away refuge and mother the only friend in the world worth having. All the misery and tragedy of life seem centred in that first clash of opposing natures. Nothing can ever be the same again! All the beautiful calm is broken; the serpent has crept into Eden and the cup of life holds only dregs!

Don't fool yourselves, dear young friends. The sun is going to shine again. You are going to love each other just as much, if not more. You have learned just one of the lessons that beset married folk and you have found out perhaps where the ice is a wee bit thin and where a "Keep Off" sign may avert future duckings. You will have more quarrels, bless your hearts, lots of 'em. They are all part of the game, but they need not sour your temper or spoil your faith in each other. I know a very dear woman, one of the saints of the earth, whose husband was a clergyman beloved as it falls to the lot of few to be loved. A young woman once came to her and said somewhat boastfully: "George and I have been married a year and we have never had a single disagreement." "Well," said the rector's wife, sweetly but tellingly, "I think there must be a considerable lack of force in one of you if you have gone that long without words. My husband and I had many a disagreement during the first year of our marriage!" So they probably had, but they were an ideal couple and devoted to each other.

MARRIED life is not all beer and skittles, and those who marry with the idea that it is, are going to come a cropper as sure as fate. It is the biggest contract that can be entered into by two people. It may not involve millions of money but it does involve the happiness of at least two people and that is of much more importance to the individual and to the community. Happiness is negotiable; millions seem to have a way of getting tied up.

Bear and forbear are two words that must be worked overtime. No one is perfect. The lover of yesterday and the husband of to-day are the same person but he is viewed at closer range and under conditions stripped of embellishment. The same with the bride and the wife. No man wants to marry a paragon nor does any woman wish to find herself tied to a perfect specimen of the male—if such a thing exists! Even the great King Arthur was condemned by exactly the attitude I have taken, Mrs. Doble. Osborn has told me about it, as I have not mentioned to you before."

"Well, I'm glad he come to you open and above board, but I just want to say one thing, and I'm glad we view it all in the same light—it's bad enough to have Osborn engaged to Berenice without that dog tracking up my house; so I'd take it as a kindness from you if you would tell him to keep that dog at home or any other place he wants to."

I am no Machiavelli, and I confess that my patience had been somewhat tried during Mrs. Doble's speech, for well enough I saw that this excellent woman had taken occasion to ease her mind, as the saying goes, concerning me and my ways, and had enjoyed doing it, so I would be less than human had I not replied with some stiffness:

"I think that dog would be more apt to stay away, Mrs. Doble, if Berenice did not feed it, and make such a pet of it. Your daughter, Mrs. Doble, knows a great deal more about dogs than my son, and it's at least as much her fault as it is Osborn's if he has annoyed you."

I saw a glitter of comprehension in Mrs. Doble's shrewd eyes, but not for anything was she going to confess to me that she was, as the boys say, "on" to her daughter's doings. All she said was:

"Tell Osborn to keep him at home, and we will both agree that the only thing we've got to do is not to do anything."

CHAPTER LXI

JIMMIE'S time was fully occupied for the next week in extracting the setter pup from the Doble house. Every little while the telephone would ring and Mrs. Doble would request me in polite terms to let some one call for the dog. We only saw each other over the telephone, but during our interviews I learned that "George was no mite of comfort," that when informed of the state of things he had only laughed and guessed "it would all come out in the wash;" which, I must confess, was a good deal Henry's point of view. He refused to take the matter seriously at all. There are times in one's life when one's husband is not the comfort that one expects he should be. What passed between him and Osborn was only this: Henry laughed at Osborn and said:

"Well, Os, I hear you're engaged."

And Osborn replied sheepishly:

"I guess so, sir."

"Make a fine tackle, wouldn't she?" said Henry, and Osborn only grinned and got out of his father's way.

So things went along until one afternoon, when Osborn was sitting on the piazza, the setter dog at his feet, he got up saying to Jimmie:

"Tie the pup up; I'm going over to Berenice's."

Just then the dog bounded off. I would have sworn that I had heard a whistle. He ran across the street and fell into Berenice's arms, and she stooped over to pat him in that knowing way of hers that makes any dog follow her.

Instead of joining Berenice, Osborn stood on the steps and whistled. The dog pricked up his ears but stayed where he was. Osborn's face flushed. He whistled again and called him in commanding tones to "come here!" The dog moved his ears deprecatingly and put his tail down, but did not obey.

"Come here, I say!" bawled Osborn, whistling again. "That dog's got to learn who his master is," my son informed me. "If Berenice wanted him or her mother'd let her have him. I'd give him to her; but if he's my dog, he's got to be my dog!"

As the dog did not move, Osborn started across the street and grasped him fairly by the collar and pulled him along behind him, Berenice following.

"Oh, Osborn!" she cried, "what are you going to do to him?"

"I'm going to give him a thrashing," said Osborn. "That pup is the hardest pup to break I ever saw."

"But, Osborn," Berenice begged, imploring eyes on her fiancé, "he's a awfully good dog. Oh, don't do that Osborn!"

"I've got to break this pup now," said

Osborn, obstinately. "What's the good of a setter that won't come when he's called?"

I thought I saw a little flicker of a smile around Berenice's mouth and I heard Jimmie mutter:

"He can come when he's called, all right!"

"What did you say?" Osborn demanded, turning on his younger brother.

"Ask her," said Jimmie, jerking his head toward his future sister-in-law. "She knows." Osborn chose to ignore his brother.

"Osborn," pleaded Berenice earnestly, "don't whip that dog!"

"He's my dog," said Osborn. "Let him alone, Berenice. I know what's good for him."

He spoke in the superior manner of the male. There was something in his face that aroused Berenice. Suddenly she put aside her baby ways, her eyes flamed.

"Osborn Preston," she said, "if you strike that dog I'll never speak to you again as long as I live. You know what is good for dogs, do you? You don't know anything more about dogs than if you were a hippopotamus. That's no way to break a dog! You've most spoiled him anyhow; if it hadn't been for me he'd be no good!"

"Oh, so you've been breaking him?" asked Osborn.

For You, Also Teeth that glisten—safer teeth

All statements approved by high dental authorities

You see glistening teeth wherever you look to-day. Perhaps you wonder how the owners get them.

Ask and they will tell you. Millions are now using a new method of teeth cleaning. This is to urge you to try it—without cost—and see what it does for your teeth.

Why teeth discolor

Your teeth are coated by a viscous film. You can feel it with your tongue. It dims the teeth, and modern science traces most tooth troubles to it.

Film clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it, so the tooth brush fails to end it. As a result, few people have escaped tooth troubles, despite the daily brushing.

Active pepsin now applied

The film is albuminous matter. So Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, then to day by day combat it.

This method long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has found a harmless activating method. Now active pepsin can be daily applied, and forced wherever the film goes.

Pepsodent CANADA
REG. IN

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant combined with two other modern requisites. Now advised by leading dentists everywhere and supplied by all druggists in large tubes.

It is the film-coat that discolors—not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Now they remove it

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a film combatant. Able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Millions of people have watched its results.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And this tooth paste is made to in every way meet modern dental requirements.

Two other new-day methods are combined with this. Thus Pepsodent in three ways shows unique efficiency.

Watch the results for yourself. Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

This test will be a revelation. It will bring to you and yours, we think, a new teeth-cleaning era. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

The Journal Puzzle for June

By TOM WOOD

The Newlyweds returned from their honeymoon and wanted a certain type of house.

They consulted an agent, who, to save time, showed them pictures of homes on his list.

By the time they reached No. 8 they thought the agent was crazy, but he smilingly told them that if they selected one-eighth from the name of each home represented, correctly, they would find they had what they wanted. Can you find what was the type of house they desired?

No. 9 represents one of the two birthstones for June.

Two prizes will be given—first, one dollar and fifty cents, and second, one dollar—for the best solutions, judged according to neatness and accuracy.

All are eligible to compete. Answers must be received by June 20th to be included.

What Can Be Done With Strawberries

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "SALADS, SANDWICHES AND CHAFING DISH RECIPES."

WHILE the ideal service of strawberries is fresh from the vines, unhulled and with stems on, and no washing to dissipate the sweetness of the fruit, only a favored few are able to compass this gustatorial delight.

The most of us are obliged to secure our berries at second or even third hand, and in this case the berries must be washed. Put them into a colander, and let cold water run over them gently until all grit is removed. Drain thoroughly and arrange them for breakfast on pretty individual plates with stems uppermost, and a little mound of sugar in the centre to dip them in.

Strawberry Cocktails.—Strawberry cocktails are delicious appetisers to begin a company luncheon. Hull and slice four cupfuls of ripe berries; sprinkle with powdered sugar, and set on ice until thoroughly chilled; then divide into glasses and pour over each portion a mixture of two tablespoonfuls of orange juice, two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice, and two tablespoonfuls each of powdered sugar and cherry juice.

Strawberry Salad.—Arrange ripe whole strawberries in nests of crisp lettuce leaves, sprinkle with powdered sugar and serve with mayonnaise dressing made without mustard and whitened with whipped cream. Another method: Hull and slice lengthwise, four cupfuls of ripe strawberries, and marinate them in a French dressing made with lemon juice, drain, chill, heap on crisp white lettuce leaves and decorate with thin slices of lemon dipped in sugar.

Strawberries with Blanc Mange, Wafers and Milk.—Scald four cupfuls of milk; mix one-half cupful of cornstarch with four tablespoonfuls of sugar and stir into the hot milk; and cook over hot water for fifteen minutes, then add one teaspoonful of strawberry extract and the whites of three eggs, which have been beaten to a stiff froth with a pinch of salt. Divide into small wet moulds and set aside to become firm. Turn out, fill with ripe and sweetened strawberries and serve with wafers, and milk.

Strawberry Shortcake.—Strawberry shortcake is prepared in two ways, but in the minds of those accustomed to it in their youth, the genuine shortcake made with a rich biscuit crust can never be excelled. The cake batter made sweet and tender, filled and crowned with whole ripe berries, lacks the characteristic charm of the old-fashioned strawberry shortcake, when the berries were mashed and sweetened, thus furnishing their own rich sauce. When the cakes, baked in layer tins, come from the oven they are buttered and covered with berries, or split, the fruit piled on the cut side of each, and one piled above the other. The biscuit crust calls for four cupfuls of sifted flour, one teaspoonful of salt, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, two tablespoonfuls of butter and lard mixed, and sufficient sweet milk or water to make a soft dough. Roll into sheets about one-half inch thick and bake in a hot oven.

Strawberry Mousse.—Rub two pounds of strawberries through a sieve, dissolve two and one-fourth tablespoonfuls of gelatine in one-half cupful of hot water, then strain it into the purée, add one-fourth cupful of sugar, the strained juice of one lemon and the stiffly beaten whites of three eggs. Pour into a wet mould decorated with strawberries and turn out when set. Serve with cream.

Strawberry Sherbet.—Mash two cupfuls of hulled strawberries, add three-fourths of a cupful of sugar and the strained juice of one lemon. Stir until the sugar is dissolved, then place on ice. Meantime freeze two cupfuls of milk, mixed with one-half cupful of sugar and one half-teaspoonful of strawberry extract. When one-half frozen strain into it the strawberry mixture and finish freezing. Serve in glasses topped with ripe berries.

Strawberry Soup.—Rinse and hull one quart of ripe strawberries, laying aside the most perfect ones. Place the others with one cupful of cold water into a saucepan and cook slowly until soft. Strain, measure and add enough water to make two cupfuls of liquid in all. Reheat, and when at boiling point, thicken slightly with two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch moistened with a little cold water. Add the grated rind of one lemon and two tablespoonfuls of sugar and cook until clear, stirring occasionally. Take from the fire, add the strained juice of two oranges, and chill. When ready to serve, add the perfect berries.

Strawberry Éclairs.—Éclairs and cream puffs, filled with the fresh strawberries crushed and sweetened instead of the usual cream filling, are among the delights of the season. To make the éclairs, put into a pan one cupful of milk, two tablespoonfuls of butter and one tablespoonful of sugar and place over the fire. When the mixture boils up, stir in one cupful of sifted flour and cook for three minutes, beating all the time with a wooden spoon. By this time it should be smooth and velvety. Take off the stove and cool; when cool beat in four eggs, one at a time and beat vigorously for twenty minutes. Put the mixture into a forcing bag with a tube and press out on to buttered tins, having each éclair about three inches in length. Bake thirty minutes in a moderate oven. Take out and while still warm coat with strawberry icing made by adding to one cupful of sifted confectioner's sugar enough strawberry juice to make a good icing. When cold, cut open on the side and fill with the berries crushed and sweetened.

Do not hull strawberries until ready to serve them.

Strawberry Ice Cream.—Wash and hull one box of ripe strawberries, sprinkle with seven-eighths of a cupful of sugar and allow to stand for one and one-half hours, mash and rub through a sieve, then add four cupfuls of thick cream and freeze. Serve with strawberry sauce made as follows: Boil one-half cupful of water and three-fourths cupful of sugar for ten minutes; cool and when ready to use add to the chilled and crushed juice and pulp of two cupfuls of berries.

Strawberry Custard.—Scald two cupfuls of milk in a double boiler. Mix four beaten eggs with one-half cupful of sugar and a pinch of salt, add the scalded milk to them, return to the double boiler, and cook until the mixture thickens and is of a smooth consistency. Strain and when cold, add one cupful of crushed and slightly sweetened strawberries. Serve very cold.

Strawberries with blanc mange.

Strawberry Fritters.—Mix one tablespoonful of salad oil with the grated rind of one-half lemon and a little flour. When smooth, add the stiffly beaten whites of three eggs, and a little milk to make the consistency of thick cream. Hull as many ripe strawberries as you wish and drop them into the prepared batter. Put a lump of butter in a small frying pan and when hot drop in the batter by the tablespoonful. Cook on both sides, drain on a piece of paper, arrange on a dish and sift over with sugar.

Strawberry Jelly.—Cut pound of berries into halves, put into saucepan, add four cupfuls cold water, allow to remain one hour, add six tablespoonfuls of gelatine, whites of two eggs, juice of one lemon and one cupful of sugar. Beat until they boil, remove whisk, draw to one side, cover and leave for ten minutes. Strain through jelly bag, add a few drops of red color and tablespoonful strawberry extract. Pour into mould and turn out when firm.

Strawberry Russe.—Crush one basketful of berries, mix with two cupfuls whipped cream, add powdered sugar to taste and beat all together. Divide into moulds lined with lady fingers and top off with ripe berries.

Strawberry Delight.—Into a large glass dish put a layer of small pieces of sponge cake, then add a layer of sliced ripe strawberries. Mix one and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatine with four tablespoonfuls of sugar, add three eggs lightly beaten and three cupfuls of milk. Cook in the upper pan of a double boiler until creamy. When cold pour over the strawberries, cover with whipped and sweetened cream and serve decorated with small ripe berries.

Strawberry Conserve.—Wash and drain four cupfuls of ripe strawberries, then put them into a preserving kettle with one-half pound of seedless raisins, one quart of sugar, grated rinds of one lemon and two oranges, then add the pulp of the lemon and oranges. Cook very slowly for one-half hour, then add one-half pound of chopped nut meats and cook for ten minutes longer. Pour into sterilized glasses and cover with melted paraffin and the lids of the tumblers. Keep in a cool place.

Individual Strawberry Shortcakes.—These are most delightful for tea, made like baking powder biscuit and slightly sweetened. Roll out one inch thick, cut in diamonds, squares or circles and bake in a hot oven. When done break open—never cut—put between them mashed and sweetened berries, buttering the biscuit first, if preferred. Put on top of each little shortcake more of the mashed berries with one or two large berries cut in halves sprinkled with powdered sugar, and if desired, crown each with a spoonful of whipped and sweetened cream flavored with one-half teaspoonful of strawberry extract.

Simply Sandwiches

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "CANNING, PRESERVING AND PICKLING."

THERE is a knack about making good, appetizing sandwiches, just as there is about making anything else. One of the most important things to be considered is the bread. Any kind may be used, depending upon the variety of filling put in. Rolls, crackers or biscuits, and toast or pastry may be used for making sandwiches.

When bread is used, it should be one day old and fine in texture. New bread that is full of holes and crumbly does not cut well. After the filling is in, the crusts should be trimmed off and the sandwiches cut, either in strips, triangles, halves, or in fancy shapes cut out with cutters. Should the sandwiches not be wanted for immediate use, they should be wrapped up in a clean, dampened cloth and put in a cool spot until required.

If rolls are preferred to bread they must be quite fresh and with a soft crust. The finger shaped rolls are neatest, and are very easy to arrange.

Slices of pastry can also be employed, and are especially suitable for evening refreshments. Any good pastry may be cut in strips or rounds baked in the oven and allowed to cool, then split open to receive the sandwich mixture.

When toast is used for sandwiches it must be thin, well made and not too crisp. Cake and gingerbread may be used for making sweet sandwiches. Very dainty little sandwiches can also be made by spreading a tasty mixture on thin bread and then rolling it up, instead of placing a second piece of bread on the top.

Egg and Sardine Sandwiches.—Scrape the skin lightly from twelve sardines and cut off the tails. Split open and remove any bones. Chop four hard cooked eggs and ten olives; then add the sardines, season to taste with salt, pepper, mustard and lemon juice and mix well, adding enough of the sardine oil to bind the mixture. Spread on rounds of buttered bread, put together and serve garnished with parsley.

If desired, the eggs may be omitted and the boned sardines alone be spread on buttered bread, then covered with a leaf of crisp lettuce and flavored with a few drops of lemon juice before the top layer of the sandwich is put on.

Chocolate and Apple Sandwiches.—Cut some thin bread and butter, and sprinkle it with grated chocolate. Peel one or two good eating apples and cut them in very thin slices free from core. Put a layer of these slices between two pieces of the prepared bread, and press well together. Trim and cut into heart-shaped sandwiches. Decorate with preserved cherries and serve.

Another method: Mix three tablespoonfuls of grated chocolate with two tablespoonfuls of whipped cream, one teaspoonful of vanilla extract and one-half cupful of apple sauce. Spread this mixture between thin slices of brown or white bread and butter, cut into shapes, and serve. Small finger shaped rolls may be used instead of the bread and butter.

Brown and White Sandwiches.—Season creamed butter with a little celery salt, chopped red peppers and olives and work to a paste. Cut the brown and white bread into thin, even slices, and trim off the crusts until the pieces of bread are the same size, then spread with the butter. Place the slices alternately, first a white and then a brown slice, until you have five layers. Press these down firmly but evenly and with a sharp knife cut down slices one-half inch thick.

Cream of Chicken Sandwiches.—Dissolve one teaspoonful of gelatine in two tablespoonfuls of hot water. Pound one cupful of white cooked meat of a chicken, add the gelatine, salt and paprika to taste. Put over the fire and stir until it begins to thicken, then remove from the fire, add one cupful of whipped cream a little at a time. Stand away to cool, and when very cold lay on thinly cut buttered bread. Another method. Mix one cupful of cooked chopped cherries, and one-half cupful mayonnaise dressing. Spread between buttered slices of brown bread. Canned pineapple may be used, in which case omit the sugar. One tablespoonful of chopped preserved ginger may be added if desired.

Delicious Sandwiches.—Boil two cupfuls of grated maple sugar, one teaspoonful of butter and three-fourths cupful of water until they form a thick syrup. Remove from the fire and add two cupfuls of chopped cocoanut, one-half pound of chopped dates and one teaspoonful of lemon juice. Stir until creamy and pour into a buttered dish. When cool, spread between thin slices of buttered bread.

Club Sandwich.—Toast thin slices of bread and while hot spread with butter. Put between the slices of bread a crisp lettuce leaf, a slice of cold chicken, a few chopped olives and pickles, some slices of hot bacon, a layer of mayonnaise dressing, and another lettuce leaf. This is a meal in itself, and may be served at a simple luncheon or Sunday night supper. A slice of skinned tomato may also be added.

Egg Sandwich.—Mash the yolks of six hard cooked eggs with one tablespoonful of salad oil and one-half teaspoonful of vinegar, work to a paste with salt, pepper, made mustard, paprika and a few drops of Worcestershire sauce. Now chop the whites very fine and mix with the paste. Spread between slices of buttered brown or white bread. Another method: Chop two hard cooked eggs, add one tablespoonful of shrimp chopped very fine, season to taste with salt, paprika and white pepper, and add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter or one tablespoonful of thick cream. Mix well together. Split some finger-shaped rolls, put one tablespoonful of the mixture into each, and close them up. A little mayonnaise dressing may be used instead of the butter or the cream, and chopped salmon may take the place of the shrimp.

Tomato Sandwiches.—Skin two tomatoes and cut them in very thin slices. Put the slices on a plate and season with salt, paprika, a few drops of salad oil and a few drops of lemon juice. Arrange the tomato on the top of some thin bread and butter, sprinkle over with chopped pickle or gherkin, and put another piece of bread and butter on the top. Trim and cut into shape.

Potted Meat Sandwiches.—Very tasty, appetizing and quickly made sandwiches may be made from all the potted meats sold in cans or jars. The paste may be spread on brown or white bread and butter, buttered crackers, or little rolls, according to fancy, and some thinly sliced cucumber, tomato, cress, or other salad added.

Roast Beef Sandwiches.—Cut cold roast beef in small pieces, trimming off all superfluous fat and skin. Mix two tablespoonfuls of butter with a little made mustard, grated horse radish, adding extra salt if necessary. Spread slices of bread and butter with this savory mixture, and lay the sliced roast beef on one-half the slices. Put thin slices of cucumber, tomato or lettuce leaves on the top, and cover with more bread. Press together, and cut into triangles or circles.

Chocolate and apple sandwiches.

chicken with one-fourth cupful of mayonnaise dressing and two tablespoonfuls of whipped cream. Spread between thin slices of buttered bread.

Cheese and Olive Sandwiches.—Mix together one pound of grated cheese, two cupfuls of butter stirred to a cream, and one-half cupful of olives put through the food chopper. Chill and spread on both pieces of buttered bread. Put together and serve. A leaf of crisp lettuce on each sandwich is a nice addition. Another cheese sandwich: Slice brown bread thinly and spread it with a layer of marmalade, jam or preserved chopped ginger. Spread a layer of very fresh cream cheese over the jam and cover it with another slice of bread. Press together and serve for afternoon tea. Or, mix currant jelly to a pink cream with the cheese and spread both sides of the sandwich and then sprinkle with chopped nuts.

Pineapple Sandwiches.—Peel and slice or grind a pineapple, add sugar to taste, and let it stand in a cool place for three or four hours. Add one-half cupful of chopped preserved

A NIGHT IN JUNE.

THROUGH the rose-scented garden in the hush of the violet twilight came the faint pattering of tiny feet, a sound as of soft leathern shoon on the parched earth. The patter of the little feet continued as seemingly through the shadows ran hither and thither fairylike forms, each bearing a single drop of dew clear as crystal. The Bird Lover sitting in the honeysuckle covered arbor heard the pattering and his eyes took on an eager light.

Faintly at first, but gradually gaining in strength, the reflection of the moon lay like a lustrous pearl on the mirror-like surface of the lily pond. The Bird Lover, now hidden in the depths of the arbor, listened for the night sounds that began to come from all sides. A shadow zigzagged through the moonlight, and his heart greeted the little goblin half bird, half mouse that was doing its share of work in the great plan of creation.

A song of rippling notes, bell-like and thrilling, came from that part of the grounds where the trees grew thickest and the Bird Lover enjoyed to the full the trills of the nightingale singing his love song to the moon. A frog croaked and in reply another grunted, then others raised their voices in protest and the first croaked again, whilst on every side darted fireflies, their lummous bodies glowing like tiny electric torches. The man watched as one darted nearby. The lighted body he knew was the bridal dress of the firefly.

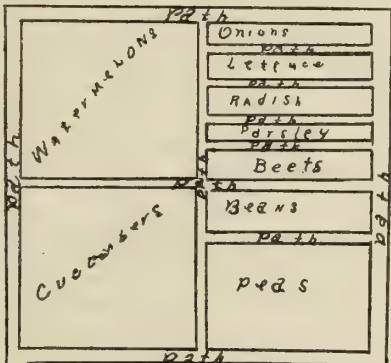

Softly on the air came the perfume of the night-scented flowers as once more, refreshed by the welcome dew, they raised their heads after the burning of the noonday heat, and the scorching of the sun's golden lances. My Lady Nicotine sent forth her sweetness into the darkness. Curiously she always held it back all the day, but once Night had spread her cloak over the earth, Milady graciously shared her gifts with all that passed her way. A pale night moth hung over her waxen bosom, drinking from her nectar sweeter far than any honey, only to desert her a minute later to seek other sips of pleasure from the night-scented stocks that beckoned to it with ghostly fingers in the moonlight.

June, the Bird Lover knew, was the month of bridal songs and bridal robes amongst the birds, the month when songs were sweetest, the plumage the richest in color, and last but not least, the month of the home life. In southern fields he knew the exquisite algette was now decking the white heron, and he breathed a prayer that the plumage hunters might fail in their quests for the herons' bridal plumes and that the shallow souls of vain women might not be thus satisfied. Even the little goldfinch, he knew now decked in sable and gold, daily singing his best songs as he flew over the fields in his ocean-wave-like manner was in danger of being caught, to be killed for his feathers or sent to some city store, there to fret out his life behind golden bars, instead of helping his mate to teach their young birds their duties and so prepare them for the daily battle of life.

He knew, too, that the home life was the happiest time of all in the kingdom of the birds, for with endless patience and skill the parent birds daily taught their young how to work to get their food. Strange, but true, how they knew that the early summer month of June supplied the best food for their babies.

Fat juicy caterpillars, larvae of insects and worms were here, there and everywhere, and these they knew were the easiest to digest. Even the seed eating birds had to have soft food for their babies. Then, if the young were hatched in June, why that gave them several months to prepare them for the winter that always came without fail, or for the long journey to be taken, if they were birds that migrated to the south-land.

A weird but piercingly sweet whistle that trembled, came through the night air and disturbed the Bird Lover's thoughts. It was repeated, and he knew that one of the night-hunters, the screech owl, was passing overhead. Almost like a challenge came the cry of the whip-poor-will as it also raced noiselessly through the moonlight. The man rose and walked to the edge of the lily pond. At once there was a hurried splash as a frog dived into the water and made the surface ripple. He walked slowly along the lawn, now heavy with dew, his feet sinking into the velvety sward at every step.

The beauty of June nights! Who would not enjoy them? After the cares of the day, who would miss the peace of the garden bathed in dew and moonlight—the south wind singing its lullaby to the flowers and birds, who would not prefer it? The Bird Lover sighed as he thought of the millions in the hot, dusty cities, worn and weary after their daily toil with no relief from the heat until rain fell to cool the hot concrete streets, and in his heart he prayed that they too would learn to love the more simple life, and leaving the tawdry tinsel and gold, turn to Nature and learn more of her beauty and wonders, that change day by day, season after season, each more beautiful than before.

MY Dear Club Members:

Few contributions were received for April, but those entered were excellent.

So sorry, Fred Hobbs, that your composition was too late, because it was written so well. Try again, won't you?

Welcome to our club, Wilfred Clarke. You have been enrolled as a member, and we shall be glad to see you enter some of the contests and win a prize.

We shall expect a snapshot of Snookie for the June camera contest, Kathleen Davies. So glad that you have joined the club at last, and hope you will write for the Composition contests. Every member has an equal chance to win a prize, so all success to your efforts.

There are no fees to pay, Harriet Montgomery, and we are glad to welcome you as a member.

Your letter was so interesting, Margaret Bissell, and I was sorry it was received too late for the judging. Have you taken any photographs of your pets? If so, won't you enter one of them in the camera contest?

In June there will be a contest for drawing. Our poetry contests have been so successful that we want to see what our artist members can do. So sharpen your pencils and get busy and decide on your subject.

Best wishes to you all from

Your Sincere Friend,
ETHEL BAIN.

PRIZE LETTER.

"Georges Clemenceau, The Tiger," by Myrll McLellan, age 14, 95 Birmingham St., Stratford, Ont.

GEORGES CLEMENCEAU was born in 1841, the son of a country doctor, in the village of Vendee. Dr. Clemenceau was a Republican, anti-Royalist, and anti-clerical. So young Georges grew up in a home which even then was regarded as a stronghold of "advanced ideas." Circumstances also helped to mould his character into that of a resolute partisan, as the second French Republic was formed in 1848, and to his father and friends this experiment seemed all that was idealistic and noble.

He entered medical college, which at that time was a hot-bed of atheism, and toward the middle of the nineteenth century a physician who retained religious beliefs was regarded as a phenomenon. He was one of the most radical of the students, and so violent was he that he spent seventy-three days in jail, and later, in consequence of his insistence on proclaiming a Republic while the Emperor was alive, the academic authorities struck his name from the rolls.

He was then twenty-three, and not rich, so he took the desperate course of seeking his fortune abroad. For four years he supported himself as a teacher of his language in the United States, and at the end of that time he returned to France with an American wife and a knowledge of the English language which stood him in good stead during the Great War, but with a complete indifference to English and American thoughts and ideals. He settled in Paris and completed his interrupted medical studies, graduating as a doctor a year later.

He Is Never Well—

YET neither is he wholly sick. He is nervous and depressed, catches cold easily. Has frequent headaches, spells of indigestion, a twinge of rheumatism now and then.

"Pyorrhea," says his dentist. "He is but one of thousands of men and women who go to pieces in middle age because of this insidious disease.

Pyorrhea begins with tender and bleeding gums. Then, the gums recede and expose the unenameled tooth-base to decay. Eventually the teeth loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the infecting Pyorrhea germs that breed in little pockets about the teeth. These germs, which are carried in the blood-stream to other parts of the body, are now known frequently to be the cause of rheumatism, anaemia, nervous disorders, and other serious ills.

Don't let Pyorrhea get established in your mouth. See your dentist often for tooth and gum inspection, and start today to use Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress, if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's keeps the gums firm and healthy—the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

First Trouble is Least Tr

By DR. LAURA S. M. HAMILTON

A Health Talk About the Small Citizen's Early Hours

OF the many situations in which this is true, there is none where it is more markedly so than in matters pertaining to the care of the new born babe.

When the careful physician or nurse gives correct attention at once to the eyes of the new born babe, they do their utmost to insure that baby from making one of the pitiful fifty per cent. of blind children whose affliction began at birth.

In the same way trouble later is often avoided by the thorough and intelligent examination of every part of the little body. No hurry on the part of the physician, nor fatigue or overwork of the nurse excuses them from this duty.

A nurse should report at once any abnormality, anything she does not understand. In the same way she should understand how to give the first necessary attentions, and the reasons of certain routine work. She should never work merely by rule.

Besides the first little clothes, which should be aired and warm, and the old soft piece of blanket to wrap the babe in, there should be ready a small covered bowl or cup of boracic solution. The strength for this is one level teaspoonful to a pint of boiled water. It is important not to make the solution strong. The ordinary solution for bathing wounds is a teaspoonful to a cup, and many people use this for the eyes also, with disastrous results. Little pieces of absorbent cotton should be ready in the solution. These should be used one at a time and thrown away, so as not to dip back any soiled piece into the cup. Sterile dressings for the cord, two or three, wrapped up ready in case of necessity, and a bottle of olive oil or vaseline—the former is best—complete the requirements.

The eyes should be washed with the boracic solution immediately it is possible to reach them. Later the same solution is used for the mouth. It is common and surer to use Argyrol for the eyes, but this is best under the direction of the attending physician. The doctor also puts the first dressing on the cord, but it is the nurse's duty to watch that dressing most carefully, examining it every hour or so for the first six or eight hours to detect even the slightest hemorrhage.

IT should be remembered that the babe has come from a place where the temperature is practically at blood heat; that it has been immersed in water, and that its lungs have not been in action, nor any of the digestive organs. Therefore it should be tended gently, and given a chance to gradually get accustomed to its new surroundings.

I think it is best to anoint the whole body lavishly with warm oil. Wipe the face, in case the mother desires much to see it. Cleanse the mouth with the boracic solution, but do not let any run down the throat. Place a diaper loosely on, and wrap the babe up warmly head and all in a soft, clinging old woolen cloth. Lay it level in a basket which is lined with a blanket. Place one or more hot water bottles around it. Be very careful they are not too hot. Set the basket in a warm and sheltered place, and cover the whole thing with another piece of blanket or flannelette sheet. By this plan the face may be left just a little exposed, and at the same time, since the basket is covered, there is no chance of any draft. There is no need to give the first bath for from twelve to twenty-four hours if these directions are followed.

Much trouble is obviated by the use from the outset of an ordinary slat clothes basket. The basket may be lined or painted as elaborately as you like beforehand, but it will answer just as well with a blanket folded for a lining and a little hair or straw tick (not a feather one), beneath the blanket. Straw or hay answer perfectly well, and if soiled can be renewed without trouble or expense.

The sides of the basket shield the child from drafts or cold, and also from impertinent fingers. People are much less likely to poke at a baby or try to kiss it in the depth than on a bed or in a the basket is easily c which does away with jiggling. The less a ba the first eight months better. At night it is a s to set the basket on a be chairs beside it. By placing diapers or whatever is needed close at hand, the babe may be attended with perfect ease and comfort, without either getting out of bed or having the babe beneath the same bed-clothes as the adult, a custom both dangerous and unhealthy.

There should be no pillow beneath the head of the babe, but by placing the basket in a very slightly slanting position, and a little roll of something beneath the end where the head lies, then when the diaper is wet the urine will run down, and will not, as one so often sees, have the babe "soaked to the neck," and necessitate a general change.

There are many other points in favor of the common clothes basket as a means of avoiding troubles. It is cheap, it is easily kept clean. It will not lend itself with any grace to either rocking or jerking; on the contrary it is uncompromisingly steady, and solid. It has no springs. It can be lifted easily with the baby in it, anywhere the mother wishes to sit or work—upstairs or downstairs, in every bit of sunshine there is, and out doors in the smallest sheltered spot, as easily as indoors. The baby that is started like Moses, in a basket, is a lucky baby.

I SAID a few moments ago that the babe had to learn to use its digestive organs. In the two or three days that intervene between its arrival and the setting up of the milk secretion, had nature required food for the child she would have provided such. She did not do this, therefore we are quite safe to infer that no food is needed. The crying of the babe is not from hunger, but is due to the expansion of the air vesicles of the lungs. Babies that do not cry frequently do not live.

It should be obvious then, though unfortunately it does not appear to be so, that the feeding to the babe of any sort of food, and surely of any sort of drug, is foolish and cruel. Anise seed tea has been known to cause such a spasm of the intestine as to result in that twist known to surgeons as intussusception. I am convinced that this condition which is far from uncommon, and nearly always ends fatally, is caused in more cases than we know about by giving decoctions or drugs to very young babies.

The same remarks are applicable to castor oil, and other purgatives given ostensibly "to clear the bowel" of the tarry substance which is really changed blood. Nature having already provided a purgative suitable for the occasion in the first waterlike secretions of the breasts, therefore it is quite right to put the babe to the breast three or four times in the day for the first three days. It gets this early secretion, learns to suck, and gets quite all the nourishment needed. A little boiled warm water in which a very small quantity of sugar is dissolved may also be given. The sugar may be omitted.

Of course, should the case be abnormal, and the mother unable to nurse from the outset, then a different course must be followed, but if it is at all possible, woman's milk should be given for at least three months. Otherwise the chance of saving the babe is small.

Before leaving this part of the subject, I would sound a note of warning in regard to giving babies and children drugs of any sort. Certain it is that such should never be administered except with a physician's prescription, or if this be unobtainable, only simple medicines, the contents and action of which are fully known should be used.

THE danger of giving "soothing powders" or so called "babies' tablets" of any sort, to infants, and

Time Plays a Part in the Beauty Game

7/13.00

"MY life is nothing but a series of appointments and disappointments," sighed the City Woman as she dropped into an easy chair beside my tea-table, "and honestly, I don't know which is the most difficult to bear. If it were not for an occasional breathing space such as this, I would feel exactly like a squirrel on a tread-wheel—always going at top speed and never getting anywhere!"

"Poor dear," I sympathized, "tell me first, do you take both sugar and cream, and then let me hear all about it."

It seemed that her particular quarrel with the world was the result of an engagement with her beauty doctor—in fact, she had come directly from his office to take tea with me. As far as I could gather, her appointment with the august being was at three-fifteen, she had arrived at three-thirty-five—a little way the lady has of considering one time as good as another—and Monsieur had words to say on the subject.

"Odious man," she declared him, "as if a paltry twenty minutes mattered! 'Madame eez late,' pronounced Monsieur. 'Only ten minutes of ze appointment remain. So, what eez there I can do in ten minutes?'"

"Keep someone else waiting and go ahead with my face," I told him, "I haven't come all this way to be given a ten-minute treatment."

"I shall do ze best I can," Monsieur had answered non-committally.

Accordingly Madame relinquished her wraps to the waiting maid and stepped into the big leather and white-enamel chair used by Monsieur's clients. "What do we have to-day?" she asked with natural curiosity. "Ze mask," replied Monsieur with no further expansiveness. What Madame wanted was an explanation of the mask and what the likely miraculous results to her complexion would be; but no, the man essayed no information, still remembering with irritation, no doubt, those lost twenty minutes.

Monsieur said not a word, but proceeded to apply a liquid preparation with a nice precision of evenness. "It smarts," the patient had declared. "Eet is intended to," replied Monsieur, and continued his manipulations. Presently, it was graphically described to me, he gave a finishing pat, washed his hands carefully at a basin in a corner of the room and while drying them imparted the information: "Madame shall remain quite for ten, pair-haps fifteen minutes, until ze mask harden. In zat time I shall return," and without further ado, departed from the room, definitely closing the door after him.

At this point my visitor became eloquent with indignation at the remembrance.

"There I was," she described, "with my face all stuck up with that horrid stuff which was getting harder every minute and that wretched man had gone out of the room and left me high and dry on my back, in a beastly dentist chair. Presently I could hardly blink an eyelid and my lips began to curl back so that I was afraid I would not be able to call out. The time seemed interminable—I thought the man had forgotten me. I wouldn't have put it past him to have gone off to take a bath or go for a motor ride while I lay there and suffered. Finally my nerves could not stand it any longer and I just yelled for him. When he came I told him exactly what I had in my mind; he did not say a word until I had finished and then remarked very quietly: 'Madame has cracked ze mask by not keeping pair-fectly still as I instructed. All our trouble has gone for nothing.' I was so indignant that I kept perfectly quiet all the time he was softening the varnish, or whatever it was, with a cloth dipped in warm water, but when he went to rub some cold cream on my poor face that had simply been skinned for nothing, I objected.

"I have another appointment and am in a hurry, don't bother with that," I said coldly, 'please tell the maid to bring my things!'

"Ah, oui," the old villain answered, 'it is good to be in time for appointments. Pairhaps when Madame come again she will remember the hour.'

"I simply clapped my things on and departed." I was told, "so now you know why I was late coming and why I look such a fright, with my hair everyway and my face all red. It simply makes me boil to think of it."

I soothed her with another cup of tea and half a hot muffin, then did a little reasoning. "Remember," I said, "you were to blame in the first place by being late for your appointment, and in the second place, for not following the man's advice and keeping quiet."

"Rubbish!" she answered; she knows me well enough to be rude. "I'm through with beauty doctors and their fooleries. After this I'll simply keep my face clean and let the wrinkles make a home of it if they want to."

But she won't—dear me, no! For all her unreasonableness, she's much too wise a woman to give up the effort of keeping her charming looks. She and her beauty doctor will make it up, I am convinced of that.

Kaustine Toilets

You Can Get Rid of the "Outhouse" in a Few Hours

ONLY a few hours' job will rid your place of the most disagreeable, most unsanitary feature of farm life—the "outhouse."

In its place you can have the comfort and privacy of a modern indoor toilet—the sanitation and efficiency of a real sewage disposal system.

And note this. To install a Kaustine Waterless Toilet won't cost you a bunch of money. Less than 50 bushels of wheat will buy it—and install it!

But don't assume that because of this low price the Kaustine Waterless Toilet is a mere chemical commode. It isn't. It is as complete a system and as efficient as the water closet used in the city.

Needs less than two hours' attention each year. Absolutely trouble-free—absolutely odorless. The white washable china bowl is thoroughly and scientifically ventilated. And in Kaustine chemical you get the most efficient low-cost disintegrating agent known.

We'll give you a positive long-term guarantee on this statement—just as we have given it to over 50,000 Kaustine owners.

Now is the time to investigate the Kaustine system. And to get an outfit installed. Send the coupon. We'll send you literature that tells the whole story—scores of genuine testimonials—and, if you like, we'll tell you of an installation near you—in school, factory or farm-house. Fill in and take out to your mail box now.

Practical Stocking Economy

By S. V. B.

$3.00

WITH all respect for those good people who re-foot their outworn stockings by any one of several methods, I believe that there are many other and much more comfortable ways of reaching the same end—economy. Neither do I write for those who have evolved collars for their best gowns out of silk stocking legs! These fill me with awe, yet I still venture to believe some may prefer to try more practical methods of economy.

My family is a large one—three women and four men—and consequently when prices of hosiery began to rise it became more necessary than ever to practice real economy, particularly since we all had a silk stocking taste entirely out of proportion to our income. The following methods have been tried out for several years and have proven quite as efficient as packing house methods in using all the available material without waste.

I HAVE our stocking drawers divided into three spaces, in the first of which are put the best stockings for all occasions. In the next compartment are placed those which, having been darned in the leg, can only be worn with high shoes. Stockings from the first section are placed here as soon as a break appears above the level of pump or Oxford. (I am speaking almost entirely of women's stockings for the reason that socks are too short to serve in many of the suggestions that follow.) If of an unsuitable color for wear with high black or brown shoes, the stockings are consigned to the dye pot for a few minutes' boiling in the proper mixture. Light colors, or white ones grown dingy, can always be dyed a good black. To-day a ten-cent package of black dye transformed a pair of hideously faded light blue stockings, one pair of gray, one of brown, several pairs of white ones and a georgette waist into articles that cannot be told from new ones. The dye could have been used for many more articles, as these were very light weight, so I bottled it and will try it again.

To go back to the stocking drawer—in the third space are put all those which, being much mended, will only do for morning wear about the house or garden. The careless habit of putting on in the morning the same pair of good silk or lisle stockings worn the previous day is responsible for much waste of good material, yet there are many women who do this and then complain of the cost of living.

NOW, although I never re-foot stockings, I feel that my conscience is clear of the charge of extravagance, for when they cease to function as stockings it is because they have transmigrated, as it were, and when they reappear it is in another but no less useful guise.

When transforming stockings, or any other material, into washcloths, holders, etc., it pays to do it well, for the laundress looks upon a hemmed cloth with respect and treats it accordingly. For the holders, I fold into a convenient size several thicknesses of the tops, and either stitch or overcast them together.

From the tops of white ones which have escaped the dye pot, I cut out the largest possible square and crochet once around with blue and have a dainty washcloth. If the tops are very fine and thin I take two thicknesses and crochet them together. The remainder is usually cut into very small squares and tucked into the corners of shopping and travelling bags, where they wait an opportunity to remove dust and grime that would otherwise find its way to a good handkerchief.

Dustcloths are made—really made. It pays in the satisfaction one feels in using such an article, rather than any old rag! For these, the legs of three stockings are opened up along the back seam. They can be then stitched together lengthwise and hemmed. These can be used as dry or oiled cloths, for they are absolutely lintless.

WHEN the oil mop has grown decrepit, the mop is removed from the holder and several opened stocking legs are inserted in the holder, the number depending on the desired weight of the mop and the heaviness of the stockings. After these have been clamped into the mop handle, the material is cut into inch wide strips, almost to the handle. The mop is then placed in a tin can and a good oil or commercial polish is sprinkled over it. It should be allowed to cure in this way for several days, being turned frequently so that the oil may be evenly distributed.

But this is not the end of my story. One doesn't always need a new oil mop, or a dust cloth, yet the stocking legs, accumulate with frequency and regularity in many families. The rug ragbag is the final destiny of all the women's hosiery not otherwise engaged, and receives practically all the wornout socks, because they are too short for most other purposes. Their gay colors, too, lend spice to an otherwise dull rug, either braided or woven. The usual silk sock, however, is too flimsy to be satisfactory for braiding, but works up beautifully in the woven rug.

In order to avoid too frequent sewing, the material should be cut spirally, beginning at the top and cutting round and round to the very toe, a strip about an inch wide.

Even in the reconstruction of worn-out hosiery, it pays to take pains, and use common sense!

First Trouble is Least Trouble

patent remedies and pills to older children, should be too obvious to any reasoning woman to require enumerating.

Yet because the custom is so widespread and pernicious, let us enumerate a few of them. 1st: We cannot recover that which has been swallowed. 2nd: All drugs may well be called poisons of greater or less strength. 3rd: Only after years of research and study can the actions of individual drugs on the human body be known, and, 4th, no one knows when a given individual may have an idiosyncrasy towards a certain drug, i.e., the action of the drug may be the opposite to the usual action, or may be many times stronger. Your baby might be one of these peculiar individuals. 5th: Not all drugs are standardized, therefore it is impossible to be certain of the strength of the drug. It is absolutely impossible to know the real strength of home brewed decoctions. 6th: Certain chemicals used in medicine, each comsisted in beyond the specified time, become positively poisonous. 8th: No two individuals are exactly the same, therefore the same remedy cannot be expected to suit a number. 9th: No two diseases are the same, therefore one "medicine" cannot "cure" a score of different ailments in babies, men or horses. 10th: Patent or advertised medicines are very apt to contain opiates and alcohol, i.e., habit forming drugs, also drugs that are injurious to the heart, together with harsh purgatives. Also, on the other hand, they may contain nothing whatever but flavoring and coloring matter, trusting to the psychic effect of spent money and swallowed medicine. Such are usually high priced.

I have considered this matter at length because this danger is a very real one, and also because the opiate menace is on the increase in Canada, and we need to meet and down the monster from every possible vantage point.

The Canadian Woman Citizen and the Dominion Government

By ELIZABETH BECKER

(SECOND ARTICLE)

THE Dominion Parliament is made up of the House of Commons, elected by the people every five years, the Senate appointed by the Governor-General, sometimes for outstanding public service, holding office for life, (at least as long as they can make their signature), and the Governor-General appointed by the King as his representative, for a period of five or six years.

The number of members of the House of Commons is regulated by the B. N. A. Act, which fixed the number for Quebec as 65. Whatever proportion 65 is to the total population of Quebec, this is the unit of representation for all the provinces. This is figured from the latest census. The census is taken throughout the Dominion every ten years, the years ending with one. The present representation is based upon the census of 1911. At that time the population of Quebec was 2,000,700; with its fixed 65 members as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, this allows one member for every 30,780 of the population. With the same proportion for every province the whole totals 234 members.

After each census the Dominion Government adjusts the representation according to population. The next census will be taken in 1921 and it is quite possible that Ontario will no longer be entitled to its 82 members in the House of Commons as its war losses have been so great. Proportionally some of the less populous provinces have had equally great losses. It is owing to this method of fixing the number of members, that the constituencies are not always the same for Dominion and provincial elections.

The Senate is not confined to any stated number of members; at present it numbers about 85. This body, which is not elected by the people, nor responsible to them or any one else, has the power to veto any legislation passed by the Commons, except that for the expenditure of money. Every bill coming up in the House must pass its first and second reading; when it has weathered these storms, it goes to a Committee, where it is either killed, approved or amended for the third reading. It usually passes the third reading without discussion and then goes to the Senate, where it must also pass three readings, unless it is defeated before it reaches the last. If passed, it goes to the Governor-General for his signature and then becomes law.

A most important part of the government is the Cabinet, which is an advisory council to the Governor-General, just as the president of an organization has an executive committee with whom to discuss policy, ways and means, etc. After an election is held the party with the largest number of its members elected, chooses a leader, who is then asked by the Governor-General to form a Cabinet, with himself as Premier or Prime Minister, at its head. These names are submitted to the Governor-General for approval. Each of these Cabinet Ministers is then assigned to one or more special departments, which he is especially fitted to administer. A deputy minister, appointed, not elected, is the competent master of detail in the department, and he stays at the helm and guides the ship of state, though party storms wax and wane.

Sometimes men much needed in an advisory capacity are chosen as ministers without portfolio, or without being put in charge of an special department.

The members of a Cabinet are usually placed as follows:

The Prime Minister, Secretary of State, Postmaster-General, Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Minister of Agriculture, Minister of Customs, Minister of Inland Revenue, Minister of Labor, Minister of Militia and Defence, Minister of Justice, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Minister of Interior, Minister of Public Works, Minister of Finance, Minister of Railways and Canals.

A very important official who is not a member of the Cabinet is the High Commissioner of Canada, who represents the government in Great Britain and looks after immigration and like matters of great importance to our country. Nor are the Solicitor-General nor the Auditor-General members of the Cabinet.

As certain matters arise that demand more time and attention than any one department or minister could devote to it, special commissions are appointed to take charge. A very important body of this character is the Dominion Civil Service Commission, whose function is the examining and appointing of candidates to the Civil Service. This is independent of party politics. Before this commission was formed each party had a long patronage list and appointed friends of the party with little regard for qualification for the specific duty of the office. This has been one of the worst features of party government. But the increasing development of democratic consciousness has demanded the abolition of patronage and the appointment to government positions of only those well equipped to fill the post.

Now, as to how over 234 members of the House of Commons are elected: When the work of the yearly session of parliament is completed, the Governor-General prorogues parliament, that is, dismisses it until next year, but if the five-year period for which parliament is elected has expired, or if there is some other just cause, then there would be an election—parliament is not prorogued, but dissolved. It has to go to the country to give the people an opportunity of expressing their will on the subject of the day, through the members they elect to represent them. For instance, the critical situation developed during the war demanded the election of 1917 to give that sovereign power of a democracy, the people, an opportunity to elect members whom they thought had the right viewpoint regarding the proper carrying on of the war. Though the specific cause for which this government was elected—a Union Government, composed of both parties—has been accomplished, they are retaining their seats, for, according to the letter of the law, their time has not expired.

After it has been decided to hold a general election and parliament has been dissolved by the Governor-General, an order in the King's name is sent out stating the date of nomination of candidates. This order is called an Election Writ, and is sent to the returning-officer of each constituency. A returning-officer is appointed by the government for each section of the country that elects a representative, and is responsible for the carrying on of the elections. Only in the case of large cities is there more than one member for a constituency.

Before the nomination day arrives, the different parties decide upon their candidates, and when the time comes there may be a long list of nominations, but usually all withdraw but one for each party, or someone who wishes to stand independent of any party. If all candidates but one withdraw, he is elected by acclamation and there is no election contest necessary. It is customary to hold the elections one week after the day of nomination, and on the same day throughout the Dominion. It is a busy week for the candidates when there is an election contest. Where a candidate is not well known in a constituency, or a riding, as it is often called, a week is too short a time to find out much about him, for often, to suit the needs of party politics, a constituency may be asked to accept as a candidate a man from some other part of the province. There is a strong feeling on the part of many good citizens that the time between nominations and elections should be extended to two or three weeks to give voters a chance to know more of the candidates' record. As one returning-officer could not properly attend to the details of his whole constituency, it is arranged in sub-divisions, with a deputy-returning officer and a poll clerk in charge of each poll or voting place. The deputy-returning officer is given a list

43% Goes for Food

Statistics say that the average laboring man spends 43 per cent. of his income for food.

And still millions go underfed.

Yet the average family needs 10,000 calories per day. And 10,000 calories in Quaker Oats cost only 65 cents.

Some Foods $7.00 Daily

In other foods 10,000 calories cost up to ten times Quaker Oats. It would cost about $7 daily to feed a family on chops or eggs.

Here is the cost of 10,000 calories—the average family's daily food need—in some prime foods, based on prices at this writing:

Cost of 10,000 Calories

|                      |        |                     |                |
|----------------------|--------|---------------------|----------------|
| In Quaker Oats ..... | $0.65 | In Hen's Eggs ..... | $ 6.00        |
| In Average Meats ..  | 4.50   | In Young Chicken .. | 16.60          |
| In Average Fish .... | 5.00   | In Vegetables ..... | $1.10 to 7.50 |

1c per Dish for Quaker Oats

15c for This

Cost of Servings

The cost of average servings is about as follows:

|                        |     |                      |    |
|------------------------|-----|----------------------|----|
| Dish Quaker Oats ..... | 1c  | Two Eggs .....       | 8c |
| 4 Ounces Meat .....    | 8c  | White Fish .....     | 8c |
| One Chop .....         | 12c | Cup of Custard ..... | 4c |

The points to consider are these:

Meats, eggs and fish, for the same calory value, average nine times Quaker Oats in cost.

An average serving costs from 8 to 12 times a dish of Quaker Oats.

Yet Quaker Oats yields 1,810 calories per pound, while round steak yields 890, and eggs 635.

The oat is the supreme food—the greatest food that grows. It is almost the ideal food in balance and completeness. It is the vim-food, the food for growth, which everybody needs.

Think what it adds to a breakfast, and what it saves for costlier foods at dinner.

These Interesting Embroideries for Dining-Room Linens May Be Carried Out in Color

THE Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12228, blue, 15 cents. An ideal design in this for a scarf suitable for buffet or serving table to be fashioned of white or cream linen with the baskets of flowers worked in brown or old blue. Raised satin stitch is used for embroidering the baskets while the flowers are in French knots. A narrow edging of Cluny lace finishes the scarf.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12229, blue, 15 cents. This is the popular bluebird design and the pattern provides four oval doilies, 7 by 10 inches, 9½ by 14 inches, 14 by 20 inches, and 19 by 26 inches. The bluebird design is worked in cross-stitch and the scalloped edges are in buttonhole stitch. The buttonholing may be in white, or in blue to match the bluebirds. The complete bluebird set consists of centerpiece 12228 and doilies 12229, 12230, and 12231. The bluebird of happiness always appeals to the needleworker especially when cross-stitch is introduced. There are no two stitches more universally known to the expert and amateur alike than the cross-stitch and buttonhole stitch. Such a luncheon set as this could be very quickly worked.

12526—Buffet or Serving Table Scarf

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12228, blue, 15 cents. Illustrated below is a luncheon set in bluebird design and this number illustrates the center-piece of the set.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12229, blue, 10 cents. This supplies six glass doilies of the bluebird set, each doily 6 inches in diameter.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12230, blue, 15 cents. Included in this are six bread and butter doilies of the bluebird set, the doilies 9 inches in diameter.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12231, blue, 15 cents. Six bluebird plate doilies, each doily 12 inches in diameter, are provided in this.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12233, blue, 15 cents. This provides a bluebird buffet scarf matching the luncheon set. The scarf may be 20 by 52 inches with scalloped finish. It may be of white or cream linen with the design worked in Delft blue cross-stitch and blue buttonholed scallops.

12235—Oval Doilies 7 by 10 inches; 9½ by 14 inches; 14 by 20 inches; 19 by 26 inches

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12550, blue, 15 cents. A charming design for oval tray-cloths in cross-stitch, and the pattern provides a diagram for the correct placing of the colors. The design is 7¼ by 13 inches and if a scarf for the serving table were desired to match, two of the doilies could be used on scarf ends, working them in the same colors as the tray-cloth.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12208, blue, 15 cents. French knots are much in vogue for embroidering dining-room linens and they are effectively applied to this centerpiece which is 21 inches in diameter. The original was of cream linen with the French knots in a delicate shade of pink and light green for the stems, leaves, and scallops. These scalloped edges should be carefully padded and worked in buttonhole stitch in the predominating color used in the scarf. Be sure that only the very best dyed cottons are selected, otherwise when tubbing your scarf you will find that the colors have run together and spoiled your piece. White mercerized cotton may be employed if desired.

12233—Buffet Scarf 20 by 52 inches

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12213, blue, 15 cents. This buffet or dresser scarf matches the centerpiece illustrated at the left, 12208. It is embroidered in French knots and lazy daisy stitch and the edges are finished with buttonholed scallops.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12000, blue, 15 cents. An unusually attractive design for an oddly shaped centerpiece embroidered in lazy daisy and feather-stitch in coarse colored or white mercerized cotton. If colored cottons are used, the edge of the centerpiece should be finished in the darkest shade.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Pattern 12553, blue, 20 cents. A charming fruit motif for a buffet scarf 18 by 54 inches and the pattern provides a diagram for correct color placing. The motifs are arranged so that they may be adapted to centerpieces, tray-cloths, and scarfs.

Nourishing Desserts

A GROWN-UP'S as well as a child's dessert should be more than just something sweet to top off the meal; it should be a wholesome and nourishing dish which rounds out and perfects the luncheon or dinner.

For instance, a good nourishing dessert which I have found to be a general favorite with all the family is Chocolate Blanc Mange. It is a favorite with the housewife, too, because it does not have to be cooked over the fire, and it is so easily and quickly made.

A woman recently wrote me that this is now her husband's favorite dessert because it is so smooth and creamy and is always just right. He was very fond of Chocolate Blanc Mange, but every time she made it of corn starch, he complained that it was lumpy and not smooth. A friend told her about my recipe, and it was a revelation to her. Now her husband complains because she does not serve it oftener—especially when they have company.

CHOCOLATE BLANC MANGE

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine.
1/4 cup cold water.
1 pint milk.
1/2 cupful of sugar.
1/4 teaspoonful of salt.
1/2 teaspoonful vanilla.
1 square chocolate or 4 tablespoonfuls of cocoa.

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes. Scald milk and add sugar, grated chocolate or cocoa and salt. When well blended, add the soaked gelatine and flavoring; pour into a wet mold or individual custard cups, and chill. Serve with milk, cream or custard sauce.

Not only does Knox Sparkling Gelatine make many delicious desserts which require practically no cooking at all—but being unflavored, it will blend with meats, fish, cheese, vegetables and fruits to make many different kinds of meat and fish loaves, cheese, vegetable and fruit salads—each adding an appetizing, luxurious touch to the meal—although in reality they are most inexpensive.

Besides being a pure, super-refined gelatine, Knox Gelatine is a favorite with housekeepers because of its economy. One package of Knox Gelatine goes four times as far as the ready-prepared packages, and serves four times as many people. Flavored packages serve only six people and do for only one meal, while one package of Knox will make twenty-four individual helpings and serves a family of six with a tempting dessert or salad for four different meals. That is why experts call Knox the "4-to-1" gelatine—because it goes four times as far as the flavored packages, besides having four times as many uses.

NOTHING has kept the "Home Land" nearer and dearer in the hearts of her children in the new lands, than the memory of the old garden at home. Poets have sung of the English garden, writers have described it and everyone has admired and loved it. The garden, like the suit of armor in the hall, or the old furniture handed down from one generation to another, has been a part of the history of the home; and a more vital part than almost anything else, in that as each year comes, a part of the family life is spent in the building, and the rejuvenation of flower and plant represents a definite period in child or parent or grandfather. "It was the year the roses bloomed so early," or "It was the year that bug came on the currant bushes," or, "It was the year the hedge seemed to get a blight; Arthur was so sick that fall." Each corner of the garden had its own devotees, and the older the garden, the richer its history. The babies had all been brought to lie beside the dear mother as she sewed the little garments, the children had been taught to love and not to destroy the precious foliage, many a love story could that garden have told, and many a tragedy had it witnessed. Then as the mother grew older, the sturdy grand children came to tell their troubles at her knee under the great oak tree at the end of the garden and the whole story began again. It is no wonder that English sons and daughters have loved the memory of their English gardens.

Out in the far North-Western part of Canada, four hundred miles North and West of Edmonton, is an English garden, still too new to have the mellow associations of the gardens in the tight little Island, but rich in its own pioneer history. A daughter of old England came out to Canada some twelve years ago, and following the trail blazed by her oldest son who had come the year previous, she went right across the continent to Edmonton and then North to Grande Prairie and then farther north to the shore of Bear Lake, straight as a homing pigeon to the home still unmade. There was no railway past Edmonton and the rest of the trip was made in wagons over the newest of roads. The father had passed away that year and the mother brought with her the rest of the family, four daughters, and two sons to meet the son, Jack, already here. The mother had been a Jersey girl but had married and gone to live in Manchester where the father was in business.

THE name of this dainty little white-haired English woman who has made such a remarkable success of her English garden is Mrs. Thompson. Making a garden, English or otherwise, was no easy task, when Mrs. Thompson decided that a garden was just as necessary in Northern Alberta as it had been in England. A garden meant Home and Home meant a garden. No plants could be obtained, as it took weeks and months to get things over the trail from Edmonton, so all flowers, shrubs and trees, in fact everything had to be started from seed, and there was no data at hand to show what were the best varieties to use in that climate and soil. Much faith—and hard work—was needed. Considering the few years since she has started her work, the growth right from the seed has been marvellous. Rhubarb is grown to perfection—beautiful fat, pink stalks; apple seeds were planted and bid fair to bear fruit in a couple of years more; asparagus is grown for the table as well as for an ornamental plant in one corner of the garden, pine trees have got a good start, flowers of all sorts bloom in profusion and fruit bushes supply the fruit for the table.

And the work is still going on, and it is not easy yet. Although the railway has come within thirty miles now, it is still almost impossible to bring in plants or slippings. Only last year Mrs. Thompson ordered some strawberry plants and when they arrived only one was alive out of the sixty sent.

She got her seeds from far and near; caraganas and honeysuckles came from Edmonton, from the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, and from England; all grew well. Lilacs were brought from Ottawa, as was also mountain ash.

"Sure, she has," grinned Jimmie. "Ask her!"

"Well, I have, then," exclaimed Berenice, "and I don't care who knows it! I wouldn't let a good dog go to waste for any man living, and I told pa so when he saw me feeding him."

"Oh, so you've been feeding him," said Osborn in icy tones. "You told me—told me without my asking you —that you never had! You needn't have lied to me, Berenice!"

"You'd make any one lie to you," Berenice responded, "with your overbearing ways. You think because you've been captain of everything in sight you can scare everybody to death; you've been jealous about the dog, jealous about him all along, and if you didn't know enough about dogs to keep your own dog—you'd every bit as good a chance as I had with him, but not knowing a thing about him—" Here she went on: "Take your old ring!"

"Take your dog!" said Osborn, releasing his hand from the setter pup's collar.

Here Berenice sank down upon the piazza steps and wept. Beautiful tears rolled down her cheeks without spolling her complexion in the least. She was one of those few girls who can cry without making her nose red.

"Oh, Mrs. Preston!" she wailed, "I thought I could love Osborn, really and truly I thought I could, though in the beginning it was because ma was trying to shove me down the minister's throat, and I won't be shoved down any man's throat, and I won't marry anybody that doesn't know about dogs and that can't shoot like pa, and I just saw a perfectly hideous life before me being a minister's wife, and you know what ma is, and I knew she'd work around pa. And he was coming to the house all the time, and looking at me—you know how they look at you! And then Osborn came along, and I thought he was better than the minister, anyway, and perhaps he could learn to shoot. But I don't believe he can!" she added. "I don't believe a man who's such a fool about a good bird dog could ever learn to shoot straight! And if anybody thinks I'm going to settle down into ma when I'm married, they're just mistaken and have got guesses coming."

She sobbed comfortably for a little while. We were all silent; I patted her shoulder consolingly. At last she rose to her feet. She looked at Osborn kindly—an older woman looking at a little boy.

"Good-bye, Osborn," she said, "I guess we've all made a mistake."

She put out her hand and they shook hands squarely and she went off down the street. A red shadow moved in the bushes. It was the setter dog slinking off after her.

Osborn gazed after her without speaking. A look of relief had spread itself over his features. Jimmie approached his brother.

"Let her go, Os," he muttered. "Let her go and good riddance, and take her setter pup with her; he wasn't no kind of a dog."

But Osborn turned and went into the house. I heard him whistling, and it was the whistle of a man who feels himself free—free to go about the world of men as he feels like doing.

CHAPTER LXII

SHORTLY after this I saw that Edith was very much worried. She sat with me more than was her custom, and talked about abstract things like ethics. She would let fall nuggets of wisdom like:

"It's awfully hard to know what to do in this world, isn't it? Supposing a person had to hurt one friend or hurt another—it's very difficult to choose."

"Indeed it is," said I gravely, for the platitudes handed out to us by our children are often fresh-minted discoveries of their own in the game of life.

I fancied what was troubling her was the thought that she was thrown more with Owen than her friend was, because, of course, when the quartette paired off (now with Berenice no longer there), Marion went with Osborn and Edith with Owen; besides Owen's attitude had been different toward Edith ever since the party.

Then one day Edith came into the house limping.

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Oh, I think I've just turned my foot over a little. It isn't anything. If you'll send Seraphy up with some hot water I'll bandage it."

"Why, I'll do it," I said.

"I'd much rather have Seraphy," she said. There was an air of excitement about her and her face was flushed.

Soon Seraphy came to me. "Whisht!" she said. "Don't you worry none about Edith's fut."

"I'm not worrying," said I.

"Don't you worry none," repeated Seraphy, "it'll be worse to-morrow; Edith won't want to step on it. But don't you go sendin' for no doctor."

"Why, what's the matter?" said I.

"There ain't nothin' the matter," said Seraphy. "Nothin' at all there is the matter with Edith's foot. She's a quare one. 'I want to pretend me fut's hurt,' says she to me. 'An' ain't it?' says I. 'Nary a bit,' says she. 'Before you go playin' any shenanigan on your ma an' your Aunt Marlar, who'll come buzzin' around me like the hornets I want to know what's up,' says I. 'I'll tell you, Seraphy,' says she, 'if you'll swear to tell no one.' An' I did, but I'll tell you so you won't be worryin' an' sendin' for th' doctor."

"It's that young gentleman, Mr. Greave, has been askin' of Edith to go to the ball-game, an' she's pretendin' to have her fut hurt, so she can't go with him, an' all because of her not wantin' to hurt the feelin's of her friend, Marion Tracy."

"Small thanks you'll get for that," says I. "She'd not do that for you," says I. "I think she's fond of him," says Edith, lookin' at me with her big eyes. "I think she'd be hurt because he axed me and not her." "Well," says I, "a young gentleman can't be axin' ev'ry young girl he knows to go to the ball-game wid him, so of course he axes the girl he likes—'Oh,' says she, 'wouldn't it be awful if he should like me better'n Marion?' 'Why, don't you like him?' says I. An' then she flushed as red as a p'ny."

"If he liked Marion better'n me," says she, "she'd feel that bad; you don't know the heart of her. She's the noblest girl that ever stepped on the face of the earth." "Huh!" says I. "She's not like you," says I. "There ain't many'd be throwin' down a fine young man like that on account o' hurtin' her friend's feelin's." "Marion would do just as much for me," says she, real firm.

"So, there you are, Mis' Preston, an' that's what's ailin' Edith. It's a fine sperrit she's got, if she is a fool. It's postin' a letter I am to him this minute, ma'am, all unbeknownst to you. It's a fool angel Edith is, even though her wings is covered wid chesnut burrs instid o' feathers."

For the next twenty-four hours I played out Edith's little comedy. Marion was, of course, with Edith a great deal, and was very sympathetic, urging me to get a doctor. The next day she rushed in, radiant. Edith had managed with difficulty to get down-stairs, and was sitting on the piazza, reading. I was inside the parlour window.

"Oh, Ede," said she, "Owen has asked me to go to the ball-game! Isn't it lovely?"

I couldn't see Edith's face, but her voice was quiet and even.

"Is that so?" she said. "Are you going?"

"Why," said Marion, "of course I'm going. I only wish you were too, you old dear. If you hadn't a bad foot, I'm sure he'd have asked us both." There was a note of complacency in her voice, however, that showed how very unsure she was of this.

Edith bore with her friend's jubilation nobly, but after Marion had gone, she moved up painfully to her room and sent down word that her foot hurt her and she wouldn't be down for supper. So afterwards I went up to see how she was. She was sitting deep in thought, inclined for cynical discussion of the world, and behind the things she said I saw she was very wistful and lonely. Somehow, she told me, life wasn't what it seemed to be; you felt yourself one with a person, and then you found out that they felt different from you, and then you found out that there was no real understanding at all.

I saw that she was face to face with the realization that almost all young people must suffer with sooner or later—the realization of our own immense isolation. Some people never get over grieving for this, but the lives of most of us are too full for us to consider ourselves majestically seated upon a solitary mountain-peak.

Immediately after the ball-game, Marion, as she had promised, came to see Edith. Her visit was short, and I noticed that she was unusually dignified as she went out. After she had left, Edith came to me. She wasn't limping any more.

"Mother," she said, "I think I ought to tell you something. I haven't hurt my foot at all; I pretended to because Owen asked me to go to the ball-game, and I thought it would hurt Marion's feelings. Very likely you know about it, anyway; I suppose Seraphy's told you, hasn't she? There's no use in trusting anybody."

"What's the matter, dear?" said I. "Oh, nothing," she said. "Only Marion found out that Owen had ask-

Proves his theory

Illustrated by Photographs

"AN associate of mine once told me, that to admit my marriage to the Public was to commit moving-picture suicide," Bryant Washburn remarked to me one day during an interview.

"I presume an argument ensued," I rejoined tentatively, thinking of the numerous pictures I had seen of him et famille.

"A very heated one too," he answered, smiling reminiscently. "My friend's argument held that, as soon as the motion-picture fans learned that their screen favorite was married he lost his prestige. And that the romantic glamour was forever lost with the knowledge of his being a family man.

"I remember I told him quite spiritedly if I could not make a success of pictures except by posing as a gay Lothario or a he-vamp, I would gladly give up the whole thing and go into the lumber business or something of that sort.

"He laughed when I said that I hoped to please and entertain a class of people who would appreciate my work and not the cut of my hair, the soulful expression of my eyes or some such rot.

"I recall too, that he shook his head sadly and sorrowfully as I went on to say that my wife and youngster, there was only one then, should be as well known to my screen friends as I.

ed me first, and she reproached me—me—for not having told her. She said she had found out that I was keeping something from her, and that we were evidently not as close together as she supposed—

"Why, do you have to tell Marion everything?" I asked.

"We have no thoughts away from each other—or we supposed that we didn't—and now I have found out that I have a whole gamut of thoughts that Marion never had. And now I shall never, never tell her about my foot—that it really wasn't hurt at all. He let it out—he let it out just as naively as anything. He said that Osborn had intended to ask her, and then when my foot was hurt, Os said: 'Why don't you take Marion, Owen, and I'll take Stella Beckman, and we can be four just the same?' And at the game, anyway, she didn't get much satisfaction," my daughter added with a touch of spite, "because that little simpleton, Belle Mather, happened to be sitting on the other side of Owen and monopolized him half the time and paid no attention to her own escort, who was nothing but a high-school boy, anyway. And just as distinctly as anything in the world, Marion heard her say, 'Marion and Edith thumbed me!'"

Seraphy appeared at the door.

"It's Mr. Greave come to ask for your fut, Edith," she said.

At this Edith got up with a run. She checked herself and looked at me. Her face flushed and she turned to the glass. I saw her in the mirror and caught the bright contagion of her smile. Then she grinned at me and turning on me a look of self-consciousness, she limped past me. There was a soft radiance about her that made my heart ache. I watched her down the stairs and saw her go helping herself along elaborately.

Seraphy turned to me. There was laughter in her face and something rueful as well.

"It's mighty grown-up is Edith," she remarked, and went her way.

I sat there by myself, Seraphy's words echoing themselves over and over in my heart. "It's mighty grown-up is Edith." A woman, very competent of taking care of herself, she had seemed the day when she had marshalled victory out of disaster, when she had been able to defy Jimmie's deviltries and Osborn's humiliation.

An icy wind seemed to sweep over me as if from the door of some cold place and I knew that the wind was the precursor of the isolation of old age. Osborn old enough to be engaged, even if it was only the engagement of an hour, and Edith going out on an adventure of the spirit! They found me old-fashioned; I saw myself mother, beloved, a little absurd, and left out from the circle of their vivid interests. A picture of Osborn and Edith came to me, Edith hanging on to Osborn's arm and looking up into his face and chattering gladly to him of the things I wanted so much to hear about—things I never would hear perhaps.

Far off I heard a noise of disaster. Something noisy and tinny clattering downstairs and shrill expostulation from Seraphy and a familiar voice: "Well, I couldn't help it, could I?"

It was Jimmie in trouble again! My heart leaped up. Thank God for that! The cold searching wind of isolation ceased.

"I'm going right to your mother!" came Seraphy's voice.

"I'll get there first!" cried Jimmie. I heard their welcome and familiar galloping, and then Henry's irritated voice:

"What's all this about?" His tone had the aggrieved note of a man who comes home to find his house in the throes of some domestic upheaval.

The mist of the afternoon vanished like a bad dream. There were some things in my life that had not grown away. I shook from me that unanimous hatred of change that assails mothers.

"They don't leave us unless we let them," I thought. Somehow, this commonplace seemed to me like a basic truth, a sudden flash of insight. Jimmie caught sight of me.

"Mother, can't I?" he cried.

With the joyfulness of one coming home from some desolate country I went downstairs to the familiar task of meeting his difficulty and of smoothing out Henry.

THE END.

CANADIAN SHOES FOR CANADIAN PEOPLETo the People of Canada

THERE are many things which you need not buy unless you choose. But footwear is not among them. You must have shoes. From the standpoint of your health, as well as for comfort and appearance, good shoes are a necessity. And that fact alone places upon the manufacturer of shoes a responsibility which he must at all times appreciate.

That responsibility to the Canadian public is shared by the 158 manufacturers of shoes in Canada, from whom you buy nearly $50,000,000 worth of footwear every year.

The fact that we have built up an industry of such magnitude is the best evidence that we do appreciate this responsibility. One may think that our responsibility ends when we have produced footwear of honest value and sincere workmanship, and have placed it on the shelf of the retail store where it is accessible to you. That is one essential service which our industry is called upon to render.

But we cannot dismiss our responsibility quite so easily. We believe that we should do more than that.

Good shoes are of such daily importance that we ought to make public certain facts and conditions which govern the quality of the product we make, and the value which you receive for your money. We ought to point out clearly, the part which you play, and the influence which you exercise, in establishing those conditions. We should urge upon you, your own responsibility in the matter, and show you just how you can help to maintain the quality of the footwear which we offer you.

This is the first advertisement of a series which will be devoted to that purpose.

Canada produces footwear of every desirable type, and of standard quality in all grades. When you buy Made in Canada Footwear you are assured, at fair prices always, of the utmost that modern skill can produce in Comfort, Service and Style.

Bryant Washburn Proves His Theory

"I HAVE stuck to that idea, and as a consequence letters come from all parts of this country, Canada, Europe and South America requesting photographs—not of me—but of Sonny.

"The little beggar will have to have a private secretary soon." His eyes shone with paternal pride and affection.

"Since our little booklet, 'The Tattler,' has come out containing reading and photographic matter concerning the family, my mail has been mainly composed of letters asking for autographed photographs of 'not you alone, Mr. Washburn, but the latest one of the family.' So you see," he finished smiling at me, "if I had a woman's prerogative, I might say to that friend of mine—I told you so."

"No more mash-notes?" I asked, trying not to look too curious.

"Oh, a few," he replied briefly. He evidently consigned them to the limbo of all necessary evils.

Nevertheless I wondered about the "few," and later asked his publicity man.

"A few!!!" remarked that gentleman fervently. "Good heavens, I wish that were true."

BUT to go back to Mr. Washburn's statements in regard to his family, I wish to say that not for a moment did I or do I doubt his sincerity in the matter, for I know him to be one of the least egotistical stars in picturedom.

Unless, of course, it be unpardonable egotism to be as proud as a peacock of an auburn-haired little woman with a wild-rose complexion and laughing blue-eyes. A chubby youngster with eyes like his mother, and who has as much good "pep" as his little body can hold. Then there is a wee one that has no teeth to chew with yet nor hair to part, but who rules the household with a pair of husky lungs and gets what he wants when he wants it.

Mr. Washburn considers and recognizes in his family one of his greatest assets, both in private and public life.

Mrs. Washburn is one of those fortunate and unusual women with two gifts rarely accorded one woman, beauty and intellect. She has what a businessman would call a "sure-fire" mind.

Thus she is not only wife and mother, but "advisory committee" as well. Much has been whispered and much has been written about the fast living of actors. But this little family has very simple tastes. It is true they have quantities of friends and social obligations; however they seem to find more real enjoyment in a picnic on the sea-shore or in the woods, than in the most elaborate banquet or ball.

On my way home from the interview, I was thinking that it was after all decidedly refreshing to find a man like Mr. Washburn who realized his wife and children to be an invaluable aid and who was big enough to admit it.

THE TASK OF THE INDIVIDUAL.

THE whole course of events as we see it seems to prove that the permanent bettering of conditions which we deplore lies in the hands of the people themselves, and that until they take hold of it the well-meant efforts of philanthropists to provide the framework for a model community will go but a very little way. Whether farmer or working man, salary earner or laborer in the mines, each man has to meet his own difficulties, solve his own problems and build up for himself the measure of success which he is fitted to achieve. Naturally the task is much easier when the means of education and improvement are placed at his disposal, but these means should be general in their scope and application and not individual. The agricultural schools and experiment stations, which are established by various governments for the improvement of agriculture, are a real benefit because they put within the reach of every farmer the opportunity to increase his knowledge and improve his condition if he will. If he does not avail himself of it, and from it create his own opportunity, he would do but little toward keeping up and developing a well-stocked model farm. The more general conditions are improved the better, but in each and every individual case the man must think for himself and work his own way out, or he will at best be but a feeble product of an artificial environment, instead of a free citizen of a democratic community.

Accessories Upon Which Fashion Has Set Her Seal

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

NE has still to pry around behind closed doors and under box covers to find the real things of summer. Like the daffodils this spring, they are slow in coming out. But no matter how inconsistent the weather-man may be, those whose business it is to prepare raiment for us from season to season, never lose faith in the ultimate arrival of each season in its turn. Therefore, our midsummer clothes are under way, and they seem more beautiful than ever. Are our dressmakers and milliners growing more artistic and expert in their work, or do things look so beautiful because almost everything is made of the expensive materials, leaving us no alternative for comparison? Logically we should be wearing coarse prints and tweeds, but prints are priced so far beyond their actual value, that one feels it is throwing money away to buy them, and as for tweeds—well, perhaps next winter we shall turn our attention to them, but they won't be cheap.

In fact, nothing is cheap, so we gratify our love for the beautiful by wearing the prettiest materials, colors and styles that our purse-strings will permit. And one of these is organdie.

This morning we were browsing around the pretty little French parlors of an exclusive dressmaker where hundreds of brides and debutantes have been outfitted, to say nothing of Toronto's titled ladies, and there we found a gem of an organdie frock, the tint of a buttercup, daintily trimmed with narrow Valenciennes lace. The hem must have been twenty inches deep and in a curved line over the hips there were four little ruffles edged with the lace. The front and back were plain save for gathers at the belt, and the bodice had a large fichu collar with a little modesty vestee in the front, and short sleeves of course. The ribbon girdle was held in place with clusters of colored silk flowers. Coming down town, we found other organdie dresses in lavender, pink and blue in a shop window, also lace trimmed and girdled with silk ribbon about an inch and a half wide.

And speaking of girdles, although very narrow, they are becoming quite consequential, if two or three we have seen lately are any indication of a coming vogue. One was a dainty pale blue corded silk ribbon an inch and a half wide with a silver cord edge, and about two yards long. About twelve inches of the section that encircled the on this side of the Atlantic, but sounds like a very sensible little garment that should be a welcome addition to many a wardrobe. It is susceptible to many distinctive treatments. With some of the new models in smart dinner or semi-evening frocks, there is a little coatee of taffeta, crepe de chine, georgette, that one feels like recommending it, but the same may be said of net, so one can hardly go astray in making a selection. And not only are there organdie dresses and neckwear, but also hats.

Whereas we used to think of summer hats as being made of straw, now we have them of all kinds of fabrics. This morning I saw a Leghorn covered with French blue georgette crepe with row after row of wool darning on brim and crown. But for midsummer, just at the moment, milliners are talking of organdie and taffeta. The ideal midsummer shape will have a broad brim, foreshortened in the back and front and given to floppiness.

Both brim and crown, especially on the taffeta shapes, will lend themselves to any occasion; they can be bent or squashed into any shape or form that suits the wearer or the occasion, for that is the way they are made. Our ideas of millinery are sure to be revolutionized before July and August are over if we are within visiting distance of the smart shops. Pleated organdie, taffeta and ribbon will be requisitioned for trimming midsummer headwear. They will edge the brim, perhaps screen the crown; they will be fashioned into rosettes and cockades and used in every possible way. There will be flowers also; flowers made of organdie, taffeta and again we find the crocheted wool flowers and embroidery decorating dog days' millinery, inconsistent as it may seem. Wild flowers, wheat and foliage will contribute their share of glory also to the midsummer millinery.

A sort of collapsible sport hat, with scarf to match, that we saw was made of tan corded duvetyn or some such material. It could be crushed as flat as the proverbial pancake, and by way of trimming had purple wool stitching. The twelve-inch wide scarf, two and a quarter yards long, had purple wool embroidery along the edges, and could be used as a girdle with a sport skirt if the owner preferred a girdle to a scarf.

These wide scarfs worn with a pleated skirt and Eton coat are considered very smart. Roman stripe silk sashes tied on the left side are the vogue of the moment.

A pretty grey ninon scarf we saw a few days ago had a couple of two-inch bands of grey squirrel across the ends.

waist had velvet flowers and foliage applied to it flat. The colors were faded rose and orange and green, and the effect was charming beyond telling.

Flowers are used in this way on the girdles of many of the daintiest of summer frocks. Some are made of gold or silver cloth, some are made of taffeta silk and some are crocheted out of wool. Roses such as one sees in Irish crocheted lace are made of wool and used in clusters on cotton dresses. Wool embroidery is also very popular. It is even used on organdie collar and cuff sets. One who believes there should be some consistency between materials and foundations will hardly feel like sanctioning such an alliance, yet, there it is shown in the stores. And what is the poor fashion writer, that she should question the propriety of it?

In another exclusive establishment, the artist who always has something new to tell us, confided that for some of her most discriminating younger patrons, she is making velvet jackets to wear with light silk sport skirts. Just a plain little velvet coat between wrist to finger tip length, with flat tuxedo collar and shoe-string girdle that just meets around the waist and fastens under the arm with a loop and button. Black, navy and deep violet are the colors that have been selected so far.

The outside sport wrap this year is both varied and important, and not the least important is the waist-length Shetland sweater knit in plain stitch, light in weight but warm, that crosses in front in surplice style and ties in the back. It comes in all colors, and black is shown to accompany the white serge skirt. One could write pages about these knitted things, there are so many of them, and one which is attracting much attention—and by the way some criticism too—is the pullover made of a very fine yarn in a mesh stitch, which is worn without a blouse, and being transparent, reveals one's camisole. It is shown in such bright shades as turquoise and jade.

The tea jacket is an English innovation that has not yet established itself ninon or net, with the addition of which these gowns become extremely smart for the afternoon tea or dance.

Smocks of studio and garden fame are also to be had in beautiful materials such as cartridge cloth—material left over from French war supplies and resembling ratine—crepe, linen, and habutai silk, garishly embroidered in wool or trimmed with applique—flowers cut from another colored cloth and appliqued with silk or wool. One finds little that is new in style, but the coloring and decoration leave nothing to be desired.

TO return to the neckwear which we touched upon in relation to wool embroidery, it is a long time since neck fixings have been so uniformly dainty. There is little variety compared with other seasons yet what there is is so dainty that one ceases to ask for variety. Organdie, net and lace with perhaps a few pieces of silk, and the story is told. There is a good deal of colored organdie, such as rose, lavender, toast (a deep cream with a brown tinge), lemon and blue. But one never counts quite so much upon colors as upon white and cream. Net and lace are tucked, gathered and ruffled and sold by the yard for vestees, fichus and any other purpose for which they can be used. Frilling is made up and sold by the yard for collars and turnback ruffles for the short sleeve, and tabbing is sold in the same way, its popularity in no wise declining, although we have been wearing it since early spring.

There are little vestees designed for the Eton suit. They are round of neck, tucked down the front, with perhaps a few rows of lace insertion and a ruffle across the bottom, for of course they are worn over the belt after the manner of the over-the-skirt blouse which is having such a success this spring. There are also round collars of organdie edged with Valenciennes lace, and cuffs to wear with the short sleeved blouse or dress. Instead of overlapping, the edges are laid together at the back and fastened with fancy safety pins. Organdie is always new when it is laundered, so

Being the last word in Fashion is the special virtue of this taffeta frock with its basque waist and cascaded back, which is said to be paving the way for the return of the bustle.

Here's a Summer frock of white organdie with pin-head dots of red, collared and cuffed and puffed with plain white organdie and girdled with the queen of all girdles, black-velvet.

Fascinating Daytime Frocks for Miss Fourteen-to-Twenty

Dress 8727
Beading 12568

Embroidery 12531

8715—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 16 requires  $3\frac{3}{8}$  yards 54-inch tricotine— $\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Long tunic blouses have lost none of their popularity and are used extensively for utility wear in serge, tricotine, and velours. A smart touch is given by the embroidered motifs in design 12531 that form a border effect on the blouse to be worked out in worsted or heavy silk floss. The short-vamp French slippers, fashioned of soft glazed kidskin and with one strap over the instep, complete this frock.

8727—Misses' One-piece Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 16 requires  $3\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch linen— $\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The only note of trimming on this smartly simple frock is the beading applied in motifs to the bottom of the skirt in design 12568. The dress closes on the left shoulder and under the left arm and shows the fashionable short sleeves finished with turn-back cuffs. The sleeves are sewn in the armholes of a front-closing underbody. The waist-line is encircled by a very narrow girdle. Attractive little slippers with the short stubby toes beloved of the chic French woman and the ubiquitous strap over the instep add a note of style. They may be of kidskin, suede, or patent leather.

The Process of Cutting Out

CUTTING out is an important art of the sewing lesson in school.

Many women, who have the time and aptitude for sewing, buy ready-to-wear garments for themselves and their children, because they do not know how to use a paper pattern. Mothers, who would like to economize by making the best parts of left-off garments into clothes for the little ones, are handicapped by the difficulties of cutting out.

The fashions of to-day are simple compared with those of an earlier generation, when voluminous, elaborately trimmed dresses, with closely fitting boned bodices, and high, buckram-lined collars were in vogue. A sewing machine is to be found in nearly every home, and reliable patterns, in varying sizes to fit persons of different ages and figures, can be bought for a few cents. Therefore, it should be easy for a good needlewoman to make a well-fitting, neatly-finished garment of better material and at less cost than a similar article from a store.

CUTTING OUT IN SCHOOL.

THIS should be done by the girls themselves, except in the case of junior grades. This certainly adds to the work of the teacher, for it is easier to cut out the garments, often two or three at a time by folding the material, in her preparation time, than to supervise the cutting out for individual members of a large class. But the experience gained is essential, and by systematic planning the work can be simplified and accomplished in reasonable time.

Even when the whole class is making similar garments it is seldom practicable to cut them out simultaneously; table space is lacking, and the tearing off of a sufficient length of the material for each girl may mean waste.

Plan of Procedure for Class Cutting Out.

CUT a duplicate pattern, to prevent possible damage to the original, allowing all turnings.

Clear a large table, and place the roll of cloth on a chair at one end.

Have ready scissors; a tracing wheel, or a lead pencil for marking round the pattern; and a few books as weights to keep it in position.

Briefly explain to the whole class the way to lay on the pattern to the best advantage, especially noting the way of the stuff, and the folded edges, if any, in relation to the pattern.

See that every girl has some work to do while waiting for her turn at the cutting-out table.

It is a good plan to let the girl whose turn is next watch her classmate at work, and so get some better idea of what she has to do before cutting out her own garment.

Also, if the teacher cannot give individual attention to the cutting-out operation, the risk of mistakes may be avoided by appointing a dependable girl as overseer. If the class is large, or the time short, two or more tables may be prepared.

Other Points to Note.

1. The use of scissors. The material must not be lifted from the table with the left hand while cutting out. The cuts should be as big as possible, and jagged edges should be avoided.

2. The way of the stuff. For bands and yokes, the selvedge runs lengthwise, that is, across the made-up garment from left to right. In all other cases the rule is that the selvedge should go from top to bottom.

3. Right and wrong side. Even in plain goods there is usually a slight difference between right and wrong sides, which becomes more marked by wear, therefore the right side should be carefully indicated by a pin, or preferably by a basting thread, when cutting out.

4. Sleeves and legs. A very common mistake is to cut two sleeves or legs for one side, instead of one for each side of the garment. When a number of similar articles are being made the error can easily be rectified, but otherwise material is wasted.

Right side to the right side is a useful phrase to memorize. When one sleeve is cut out, for instance, lay it on the new material with the right sides touching, and cut out the other.

5. Small parts of the pattern. These need not be cut by every girl as they may be obtained more economically from the pieces left over at the end. It is a time-saving device to keep all the bands, etc., for the class together, each sort rolled separately in paper, ready to hand to individual girls when required.

Pieces cut on the bias, for false hems on curves, are best made by cutting on lines drawn parallel to the diagonal of a square of material with a strip of thick paper of suitable width.

6. Odd pieces. These should not be thrown away, but kept in a rag bag, for use should it be necessary to practise hand or machine stitching.

FIRST LESSONS IN KNITTING.

Knit on tightly, but cast off loosely. When a purl stitch drops, and makes a ladder, turn the work, and pick the stitch up on the reverse side as a plain stitch.

This is done either with a bone crochet hook, or by pulling the loop over the bar with the other knitting needle, or with the eye of a large darning needle.

When a stitch is dropped some distance down in plain knitting, begin to pick it up on the plain side by one of the above methods, and turn the work for each row till no bars remain.

Never leave a knot in the wool but break it and join.

To join in knitting, leave at least six inches of the old wool, and place the end of the new ball by the last stitch knitted, and hold the two strands together. Knit a few stitches with double wool, and then continue with the new ball. The ends, which should be on the wrong side of the work, must be darned in later.

Chain edge is the best finish for the sides of an article knitted on two needles. In plain knitting it is not sufficient to merely slip the first stitch.

To make chain edge (plain knitting) slip the first stitch of the row in the purl way, having the wool in front. Hold the needles apart, and pass the wool from the front to the back, and then finish the row.

PROPER shampooing is what makes your hair beautiful. It brings out all the real life, lustre, natural wave and color, and makes it soft, fresh and luxuriant.

Your hair simply needs frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, but it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soap. The free alkali, in ordinary soaps, soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it. This is why leading motion picture stars, theatrical people, and discriminating women use

WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

This clear, pure, and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and has the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is. It leaves the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy, to manage.

You can get Watkins Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo at any drug store. A 4-ounce bottle should last months.

implanted, and not all the care of later years can remedy.

All matters of feeding, of toilet, of sleep and "airing" for a baby or little child should follow the same routine and be done with unswerving regularity. Thus the organs of digestion and assimilation; of elimination and recuperation, will presently work mechanically, and the nervous system, always unstable in a little child, will be relieved from shock and strain, and will rapidly gain its equilibrium.

Far more extensive and serious injury is done to the nervous system in the first two, or indeed one may say seven, years of life, than the laity have any idea of. It is, however, becoming more and more a matter of assured knowledge to nerve specialists and students of mental illness, that a large percentage of such nervous disorders are caused by shock or overstrain in early childhood. It is stupidity and laziness, so-called, of later years, is due to the same cause.

It has also been proved that much of the constipation, which is at the root of the greater amount of present-day illness, is the result of bad habit, which in its turn is due to lack of the correct training from babyhood onwards.

To "chance" a thing, to work at haphazard, to follow "old wives' fables," denotes a childish ignorance and lack of culture that should belong only to an age that is past. To thoughtfully, bravely, patiently, follow out in our daily living and dealing with human life, the very best that we are able to discover and acquire, denotes the highest form of education and culture. And such should be the only course considered as open to the Christian Canadian parent of to-day.

Georges Clemenceau was not a complete success as a physician, but took great interest in politics, adopting the most violent views. He soon sprang into notoriety, and was elected Mayor of Montmartre. He was a patriot, and in 1871 voted against the delivery of Alsace-Lorraine to Germany. His great wish was to rebuild France on more democratic foundations.

In 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly, and five years later entered the Chamber of Deputies, in which he became leader of the Radical party. At this time he was nearly forty years of age, and during the next twenty-five years not one Cabinet fell while he tolerated it, none lasted after he tired of it. He had taken to journalism and in a great many instances overthrew a Cabinet by one brief editorial from his pen.

During these years he exercised great influence. He was against colonial expeditions, and wanted a revision of the constitution because he thought it insufficiently democratic. In 1893, the Panama scandal filled the world with disgust and brought about his downfall. A Frenchman named Lesseps organized a company to dig the canal, and it was later found that two-thirds of the nine hundred million francs invested by Frenchmen went to pay for auxiliary jobs and advertising. Part also had been spent in winning the good-will of the Deputies, and Clemenceau was believed to have accepted some of the money for his paper. For the first time in years he had no seat in the Chamber, and for nine years was kept out of French politics.

This period of the life of Clemenceau deserves attention, as it was then he wrote his great books, foremost among them being "Les Plus Fort," and "Figures de Vendee." When he became a Senator in 1902 it was thought that he had definitely retired.

However, many felt that he should have a trial at the Premiership. In 1906 he was made Minister of Militia, and about six months later became Premier, and held this office very worthily. He brought about the downfall of Caillaux, and in spite of the great personal antipathy between himself and President Poincare, they both threw aside party feelings and worked together harmoniously for the good of their country.

As for the role which Clemenceau played in 1918, it can be summed up briefly—from the day he took office, in spite of the dropping out of Russia; in spite of the tremendous efforts of Germany, there never was any doubt in France of final success. Clemenceau inspired this faith. He made Foch feel that he would be supported in any emergency. He visited the front frequently and saw the men, often two or three times a week, making them feel that someone was behind them.

Finally, his indomitable resolution to achieve results and never to be reconciled to defeat, is in strong contrast to the government of his predecessors, and earned for him the title of "The Tiger of France." It is safe to say that the gratitude, respect, and admiration of not only France, but the whole world, is accorded to Georges Clemenceau, the "Tiger of France."

PRIZE LETTER.

"What I Am Going to Grow in My Garden," by Mary E. Jackson, age 11, Malton, R.R. No. 1, Ont.

THIS year I intend to make two gardens, one for vegetables and one for flowers. I am getting the soil ready first, for if this is not properly done, the seeds will not grow. As far as possible, my gardens will be in a sunny spot, shaded at the back from the north winds. I am mixing manure with the soil to make it rich so that the seed fairies will soon awaken from their long sleep. When all danger of frost is over, I shall plant my seeds in little trenches or hills, according to the directions on the packages.

The squash and pumpkins are going to be put down at the bush with the field corn.

My flower garden is going to be planted with balsams, carnations, sweet peas, scarlet runners, petunias, zinnias, sweet william, nasturtiums, morning glories, and globe stocks.

The scarlet runners and sweet peas I am going to plant along the back-yard fence. In the adjoining bed there will be balsams and carnations. In a bed made where an old stump used to be I shall sow globe stocks. These will be seen from the back kitchen door. Petunias, zinnias, sweet william, and dwarf nasturtiums will be along the veranda, with morning glories climbing up behind them, where they will get the early morning sun. Dahlia bulbs will be in a small bed in the lawn opposite the front door.

Pertaining to the Summer Wardrobe

The scarf illustrated in the centre of this page is of printed indestructible voile or Georgette crepe with a band of baronet satin all around it. The fur tie is of grey squirrel, the pendant end has passed through a slash and is finished with a cut steel ornament. Right in the centre back there are three organ pleats which make it different from the ordinary fur tie. Ordinary, did we say, as if any furs could possibly be ordinary at the prices they cost us! However, we shall soon cease to wonder at anything that may happen in this world of apparel, for even though prices of common necessities are vying with the achievements of our famous aces, summer furs have never had such a vogue as they are having now and are likely to have for a month or two. We mean that the fur stores are selling unusual quantities of beautiful neck pieces, such as squirrel, mole, Lucille fox, and Russian sable. Novelty fur, and combinations of georgette crepe or crepe de chine and fur capes are also being purchased, but the majority of people have an eye to the practical and next winter's comfort. And while we think of it, let us mention that this is the season to take one's fur coat to the furrier for repairs.

Our artist has sketched a couple of novelties in the centre illustration which betray their Oriental origin at once. The head dress has a band of gold cloth around the head and over the top of it and from the sides depend strings of pearls and the armlet is of pliable gold with carved jade. There is quite a vogue for jewelry just at the moment. There are novelty earrings of antique gold finish with jade setting, and some with sapphire, which is proving a formidable competitor of jade in popular priced ornaments. There are also some rather gorgeous necklaces which we are told are to be very vogueish with the summer costume. For instance, there is one of antique finished gold and jade. Diamond-shaped pieces of jade are separated by metallic ornaments and beads, all held together by a rather fine chain and finished with a highly ornamental pendant of the antique gold and jade. Another is of carved and plain ivory beads, a style that it is expected will be quite popular.

toleration for these devoted mothers who simply submerge their personal interests in favor of their children and their households. They are self-constituted martyrs, and if they lose the interest of their husband and their friends, and the pride which their children should feel in them, they deserve what they get. I never knew it to fail yet that a mother who spent time and money unnecessarily on her children at the expense of her own appearance, was sorry for it at some time. You have started me on a subject I could simply talk for hours on, probably without doing a particle of good, for when a woman is born to be a fool of a mother, nothing on earth is going to stop her, and you cannot make her believe that it is kinder to herself and her children to keep her looks as long as she can than to sacrifice them. Certainly I like "running" a beauty page, dear Coz; it has many bright spots, and I count it an especially shining one to receive a nice, bright letter such as yours. ## British Columbia Women's Institutes New Secretary

MRS. V. S. MACLACHLAN, secretary of the British Columbia Women's Institutes, is a woman of many talents. She is not only a good organizer, but also a good speaker, and her work is most appreciated by her constituents.

As a promoter and organizer of successful undertakings, Mrs. MacLachlan has been active in the province. Among the many activities which she has helped to launch was the South Saanich branch of the Anti-Tuberculosis Society, started in March, 1909, and of which she was the secretary during its existence. Under her regime the branch furnished a room at Tranquille Sanatorium, paid for the maintenance of a patient, and assisted the family.

An active member of the Royal Oak Women's Institute, Mrs. MacLachlan also organized the Garden City Institute which is composed of some of the "lives" women on Vancouver Island, and has a splendid record of work to its credit. She is also a member of the Tillicum Women's Institute and the Ward VII. Cottage Gardeners' Association.

It is a significant fact that none of the organizations to which Mrs. MacLachlan belongs confine themselves to the passing of resolutions, but bend every effort to ensure the success of any scheme which they undertake.

Of all the delegates attending the Women's Institute Conference in 1915 when the scheme for establishing district nurses was outlined by Mary Ard MacLennan, then Chief Superintendent of the Victorian Order of Nurses, Mrs. MacLachlan was the only one who succeeded in establishing the nurse in her district. It is through her untiring energy and zeal that the present magnificent health programme is before the people of Saanich to-day. Holding the office of vice-president of the Saanich branch of the Victorian Order, Mrs. MacLachlan is working hard to consummate the scheme for the establishment of the war-memorial health centre in the district—she being one of the promoters of the project. An active member of the Local Council of Women, Mrs. MacLachlan is convener of the standing committee on agriculture, and is also convener of the combined joint committee on health of the Reconstruction Group and Women's Council.

Nor is her interest confined to health matters, for she is gaining a reputation as an authority on goat-rearing—having achieved much success in raising these quadrupeds.

During the campaign on behalf of women's suffrage, Mrs. MacLachlan was chosen to tour Vancouver Island, speaking in the interests of the movement at Liberal and Conservative meetings throughout the Island. Further evidence of her versatility is shown by the fact that she is becoming a contributor of some repute to a number of well-known periodicals published in the interests of women's work.

HEALTH AND SCHOOL ARE OBJECTS.

THE work which occupied the attention of the members of the Institutes of British Columbia, to the almost total exclusion of all else during the war was the Red Cross work, says Mrs. MacLachlan. Since the war has ended the Institutes have been public health and rural school improvement. Perhaps a quotation from the "Fundamental" report of the board of health will show the importance of the Institutes to the health work in the rural districts, more particularly in regard to district nursing.

Health teaching by public health officers, including visiting nurses, has made in the last few years a great impression upon the communities where it has been carried on. Such health education is going to be recognized as of fundamental importance, it is largely because of this, and not because disease is more successfully treated, that the great reduction in the sickness and death rate has been effected. Unless aided by educational agencies, efforts at improvement in public health have almost invariably proved to be very transitory in their efforts.

Recognizing these facts, the department is undertaking the establishment of health centres throughout the province. The first was established in the municipality of Saanich, adjoining Victoria, under the charge of Miss Forshaw, Victorian Order of Nurses, a young lady of exceptional ability, possessing great organizing powers, enthusiastic in her work. Miss Forshaw took charge of the work in Saanich, and it has grown until now there are three nurses engaged; a health centre house has been opened as temporary quarters; a by-law is being submitted to the people to raise $25,000 to build a permanent home. (By-law was carried on 17th January).

"The practical work that Miss Forshaw and her colleagues have carried out has been a wonderful help to the department by impressing upon the other districts the benefits to be derived from following this plan. Other points on the Island are asking now for nurses, and, at your instance, Miss Forshaw was sent to visit the Women's Institutes through the eastern part of the province. It is very gratifying indeed to learn from those whom she visited of the impression she made.

"I have recognized that the success of this movement would depend entirely upon the continued interest of the women, and I felt that the best means of reaching the people of British Columbia was through the Women's Institutes.

"Mrs. V. S. MacLachlan, secretary of the Women's Institutes for the province, was largely instrumental in starting the Saanich health centre, and I am very pleased indeed that I was able to secure Mrs. MacLachlan's help and hearty co-operation in bringing the matter to the attention of the different Women's Institutes. Mrs. MacLachlan is an enthusiastic worker, a splendid speaker, a good writer, and with a thorough knowledge of her subject, is able to present the facts in a manner that carries conviction.

"The object of the establishment of these centres will be to do the follow-up work, especially as regards the school children, infant welfare, maternity and tuberculosis work. We have made such a beginning that I feel very hopeful for the future development of health work along these lines."

Within the last three months there have been many requests received from different parts of the province for information on organizing Institutes. These enquiries have been due to the record of work reported each month in the "Agricultural Journal," so that it is very evident that the line of activities carried on during the current year is appealing to members of the farming districts, not only as desirable but necessary, in order to make settlement not only permanent and prosperous but safe to bear and rear the most precious asset of the nation.

New Institutes are springing up with child welfare, school welfare and district nurse, sanitary improvement and community welfare, etc., as the aim and object. There are constant enquiries for literature, information and direction on how to conduct the Institute in order to get the best and immediate results.

New Institutes formed during the year 1919 are Kootenay Valley, Bonnington and South Slokan, and New Denver in the Kootenay and Boundary District. Armstrong and West Summerland in the Okanagan have been organized, and will be formally inaugurated at an early date this year. Langley Triangle, South Vancouver and Mt. Lehman in the Lower Mainland and Strawberry Vale, Denman Island and Cobble Hill in Vancouver Island District.

Of the sixty-four Institutes in active operation, the membership is 2,440; money raised, including Government assistance, $18,874; money disbursed $15,261. Thirty-nine held either flower shows or exhibits of school work. Several held health exhibits, including panels from the board of health, and exhibits of proper food for children of different ages, and proper school lunches. Lectures by different speakers on different subjects, such as "Teach of School Children" and "State Health Insurance" were included in these exhibits.

Active Work in Schools.

Twenty-four report active work in the school welfare. This includes providing a hot lunch for the school children, improving school grounds (and hence knows they need advance), sanitary conditions of the schools, agitating for consolidation of schools, supporting the school gardens, domestic science and manual training. One Institute erected a shed where the children may play on rainy days. Another conducts a juvenile musical club, another erected a drinking fountain in the playgrounds as a memorial to the fallen soldiers, and in most of the Institutes a school committee is formed which visits the school periodically.

Twenty-two Institutes report active efforts along public health lines, while just about the entire number are interested and anxious to have a public health nurse in the district. The entire sixty-nine which will be in operation before the end of January, 1920, stand ready to support to their limit the public health nurse directly she is available.

In connection with this a resolution has been sent in by an Institute to the effect: "The Women's Institutes of the province respectfully petition the Honorable, the Provincial Secretary, to make such provision in the estimates to be presented to the House during the coming session as will allow of assistance being granted to such districts as will, upon examination be proved to be unable to assume the total cost of the installation of a health centre presided over by a public health nurse."

There has been a little interest evinced in industries such as knitting, weaving, basket, toy and glove making. This is only in the preliminary stages yet, but promoting and educating is the very important work that the Institutes can do.

No Institutes have reported study courses other than a short time given at each meeting to the reading of portions of the "Busy Woman's Handbook."

TEN DAY W.I. COURSES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

By Elizabeth Bailey Price

TEN day courses in domestic science, home nursing and millinery form part of the 1920 programme of the New Brunswick Women's Institutes just completed. These have been held at the various centres of Sussex, Moncton, Devon, Perth, Chatham, Bathurst and St. Stephen with the object in view of placing within easy reach of every woman and girl in New Brunswick the advantages and benefits to be derived from a ten days' intensive training on these very important subjects. In order to do this, the New Brunswick Department of Agriculture engaged specialists to give practical instruction in these matters that tend toward a high standard of efficiency in home and community life. Prizes of five dollars for the highest total of credit marks obtained by means of written examinations and practice work were given with the stipulation that contestants were not allowed to compete for more than one prize.

The method of the course was as follows: The first day the student went to the cookery lecture, where practical work in class was done; from there to the millinery class, where she was advised as to the selection of material and shape of hat to be made; and then on to the nursing, where instruction in bed-making was given.

New Brunswick is planning to open these short courses in the French-speaking districts of the province, the courses to last four days. Mlle. Le Blanc, the assistant superintendent, will take the courses in cookery and sewing, while Miss Alice Landry will give the lectures on nursing. These courses are being put on at St. Basile, St. Quentin, Caraquet and Rogersville. They are the second to be put on in these districts, and are put on with the hope of laying a foundation for the more complete course later on.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES AMONG SASKATCHEWAN HOME MAKERS' CLUBS.

I WAS sent to Hawarden to give a course of lectures in household science, and, if possible, organize a Homemakers' Club. As in many other places, the Women's Club work was at a standstill, waiting for a new start. They had had a very active Red Cross Society, but after the war it had naturally died. We had a very good meeting the first evening. The attendance was not very large, but there was enthusiasm in the air, which made up for lack of members. The work of the Homemakers' Clubs was outlined to them. They were interested—not merely good listeners. They were thinkers and doers as well. Most people are interested enough to listen, yes, even attentively, but there are few who listen, think and act. After the lecture, enthusiastic little groups were noticed here and there about the room, and I felt confident, that organization was the topic. A few immediately began to think of the possible president, realizing, that a capable leader is the first essential of a successful organization. They, seemingly, experienced little difficulty in making their choice.

The afternoon meeting the following day was held at one of the homes. It seems to me that the atmosphere of "home" contributes much to the spirit of a meeting. I cannot explain this, but I feel it. A cooking demonstration was given. Again the women did not only prove good listeners. They were thinking, for they asked questions. After the demonstration, the women seemed a little lost. There was no evidence of real sociability among them, in fact, no one had anything to say. The unexpected appearance of tea, sandwiches and cake cleared the atmosphere. Instantly, chairs were drawn closer; groups were formed and everyone had something to say; in fact, some had to wait for their turn. The tea worked wonders! I decided then and there that tea will be served, at all reasonable hours, to anyone, in my "house of dreams." This resolution I have renewed on several "tea" occasions since that time. As the women departed, I noticed with satisfaction, the happy and cheerful faces—the result of the "tea" and the "chat."

We had another meeting in the evening. After the lecture a vote was taken to decide whether they were to have a club or not. A club was desired by everyone present. The president and officers were quickly elected. The election of officers is such a serious matter, and our clubs would be more successful if women would realize this. One or two persons can make or break an organization. My entire experience at this place went to show that a community may have a successful club, or anything else it may desire, if it has but one leader—one woman who is capable and willing to accept the responsibility of leadership. Where there is a will there is a way—always. The president may have innumerable difficulties, but all can be overcome by love and persistence. We fail because we invite failure, we expect failure. If we would make a successful club our goal, and accept no alternative, we would have successful organizations. About two weeks later a report was received from the secretary of this club. The women were then busy decorating and furnishing a rest-room. By now this will be finished, and no doubt they are equally busy with some equally worthy object.

A course of lectures in agriculture and household science was to be given at Brownlee for the school children in connection with the Boys' and Girls' Clubs. I was sent to this place. I was delighted to find that the principal of the school was a real woman. All her interests were with the children. The parents were mostly too occupied with their work and money matters to give much thought to the school and the education of the children. Their attitude in general was one of indifference. Circumstances led me to conclude that the teacher, an entire stranger in the community, was most truly interested in the future of that school and the children. I gave a demonstration on the canning of vegetables. I do not like demonstrating, but I really enjoyed this one, for the children followed every step with keen interest and gave splendid answers. How hungry the boys and girls everywhere are for knowledge.

I had a little personal talk with the girls the next morning about their development and opportunities. Most of them were wide awake—with wonderful possibilities. I could not help but think that if they are not healthy, happy and useful women a few years hence, it will be because they were not given a "square deal"—a chance. Woe to those who take their responsibility lightly or neglect their work!

THE ENTERTAINMENT OF THE GUEST ON THE FARM.

By Betsy McAllister.

OUR subject is certainly one that appeals to each one of us. We, who live on the farm, oftentimes find ourselves confronted with greater difficulties regarding the entertainment of guests than our sisters in the town or city.

Very often our household cares and woman's work about the farm take up so much of our time that we have little leisure time for so-called entertainment of guests. However, we feel that there is no place where a guest can be so well entertained as on the farm—no place where there can be as much real enjoyment as on a farm—no place where one can be so close to nature.

So much depends too on the guest. If a guest is very staid and prosaic, of course, she is harder to entertain, but there are very few such people to-day. If your guest is from the farm, such person will undoubtedly be interested in everything about the farm and anxious to see and learn how others do their

English Institutes Want To Correspond With Those in Canada

THE following letter has been received by the Publicity Secretary of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada from the Federation of Shropshire Women's Institutes, in which request is made for correspondence with the Canadian Women's Institutes. Any Institute to whom this appeals is asked to write to the address below. The letter is as follows:—

"Dear Madam:

"Two Shropshire Institutes have expressed a wish to be linked with Institutes in Canada. One Institute is on the outskirts of our county town of Shrewsbury, so is not a really rural Institute; the other is right out in the country.

"Our idea is that we should write letters to the Institutes, possibly every two months, telling each other anything we may think interesting to the other side. If you think this is a good plan, would you be kind enough to put us in touch with two Institutes?

"Yours faithfully,

"GWENDOLINE ALCOCK,

"Chairman Shropshire Federation W. I.

work and also spend their leisure time. If a guest is from the town, everything will be new and interesting. The freedom of the farm will be enough to entertain in itself. The guest will appreciate the chance to roam about, get in touch with nature, in the flower, the bird and bee. While we speak of this entertainment of the guest, this is only "general." We cannot entertain without some thought of food or recreation.

It is a well known fact that very few people on the farm live from "hand to mouth." We pride ourselves on the fact that we keep a supply of food on hand, so that should an unexpected guest arrive, we do not immediately become flustered, but can rest on our oars, and feel that we have at least something to make a decent meal.

If a woman is provident, she has stored away in her cellar a goodly supply of fruit, pickles, vegetables and such like. This is not extravagance, this is common sense. God provides these things, each in its own season, and it is our privilege, nay, our duty, to see that we take care of these and store them away for other seasons. With a goodly supply of these, one can feel at ease, as she has something to turn her hand to at all times. Then most farmers are well provided with meat. We do not expect always to have a supply of cooked meat on hand, but we can soon cook it, and so many dainty, appetizing dishes can be made when one has such a supply. Not that one needs to use such great quantities, but one can combine the meat with the vegetables already stored away and make very tasty, nourishing dishes. We also usually have plenty of butter, milk and cream on hand, and so feel we have a great deal with which to provide for the inner man.

Regarding the entertainment of guests on the farm, there is so much to interest one when she does not feel shut in by her neighbors' house on one side, a store on the other, and a full clothes-line to the back. Such freedom appeals to everyone that we do not feel duty bound to provide amusement for our guests. Any guest who comes to our homes will appreciate far more being allowed to assist with the household duties, then, when the tasks are done, all can enjoy themselves together. In winter, a sleigh ride is always enjoyed and an evening spent at a neighbor's house, where games, music, etc., are engaged in, is not only pleasing but profitable.

The sociability enjoyed in winter around a bright cosy fire while the storm rages without is (though it sounds like a paradox) like an oasis in the desert—a green spot in the memory of many a person in this land.

One great point in entertaining a guest is "do not fuss." Fuss and worry are two great means of wearing out one's nervous system, and instead of it being a pleasure to have a guest in the home, it becomes a "mountain of bother." Whatever you do, be natural and do not neglect the work which has to be done.

While we talk about guests, we must not forget that we have ever with us "The Unseen Guest," and make our hearts and homes a welcome place for Him as our Chief Guest.

FROM NOVA SCOTIA

It is most encouraging to see the progress of the Women's Institute in Nova Scotia. The women are gradually awakening to the great possibilities which lie in the organization, and are beginning to use the power which belongs to it.

A rather amusing incident occurred at a place where a newly organized Institute was discussing work. For some time the water supply at the school had been out of order and buckets of water standing in the hall had been the sole source of supply for drinking water for the pupils. Those in charge of repairing the water system had gone on the principle that "any time would do" for attending to the matter. When the Institute was organized, the ladies decided to take action. It is worthy of note that the matter was attended to at once by those

MOIR'S Chocolates

THOUSANDS of men commenced to eat Moir's Chocolates while in service overseas. They loved the nourishing candy with the distinctive taste and wrote home for more Moir's.

Just as tea is now an afternoon beverage with service men, so have they become attached to the habit of eating Moir's Chocolates whenever that old trench craving for sweets comes upon them. They know Moir's Chocolates have a hundred or more varieties of fillings—and have found those that suit their taste.

in authority, before the ladies had time to take any action in the matter.

Gardening has been a subject of interest to many Institutes during the spring months. One Institute organized a seed committee and ordered wholesale. In this way they secured good seed at wholesale rates, and a spirit of neighborliness and friendly competition has been introduced. They are looking forward to a Women's Institute exhibit of fruits and vegetables and canned goods at a Fall Fair.

Thrift as a patriotic measure has been before the Institute, and gardening has been urged as an opportunity to give assistance in this all-important campaign.

Moving pictures on gardening subjects and other subjects of great interest have been a feature at some of the Institute meetings this spring.

The school is of unfailing interest to the Nova Scotia Women's Institute. Gifts from the Institutes of new books and maps have been appreciated greatly. Cleaning, painting and general improvement campaigns have been in full swing, and now the school gardens are matters of great interest.

Bridgetown entertained the High School girls (about thirty in number) at one of their meetings. A special programme was put on for that day and dainty refreshments served.

Blockhouse hopes to obtain a Hall for the Institute and is working toward that end.

Barss Corner finds the study of citizenship has been of great interest at their meetings, also the work of the Institutes in other Provinces of our Dominion.

Carleton is working to erect a memorial to its soldiers.

Caledonia keeps up to the events of the day with its study of Immigration problems and of European conditions.

Deerfield and Pleasant Valley are becoming interested in local improvement.

Glance Bay has a newly organized Institute which has made plans to establish a Victorian Order nurse in their community. They have assumed the responsibility for her support.

Hantsport Institute has joined hands with the town council to beautify and improve the town, as well as the school. Assistance to the Children's Aid is also given by this busy Institute.

Kempt has bought a building to remodel as a hall. The Institute is interested in all Community work, and has always given support to the school children in their school fairs.

Paradise has taken steps to improve the water supply in the schools. "What other Institutes are doing" made an interesting roll call at a recent meeting.

Sheffield Mills believes in making the most of what is at hand. At a recent meeting of the Institute a demonstration and talk on "Different ways of using and cooking Apples" was of practical value. As Sheffield Mills is in the centre of a famous apple district, this is most practical.

A new Institute has been organized at Lovely Bear River, Digby County, which will do great things, judging by the interest and activity already shown.

Miss Stuart, our representative on the Dominion Federation, has organized an Institute at Gaspereaux, which has great plans made for the future.

A WORD FROM TREHERNE.

THIS society is not a large one, but has done much work for the community. Since its formation it cleaned up the local cemetery, sent a good many dollars to Red Cross, adopted a war orphan, organized a fruit club, and is going to give two prizes at the local fair for the "best babies." So, by that it will introduce child welfare. The town also boasts of a big Boys' and Girls' Club. The society is badly handicapped in having no permanent meeting place, but hopes to secure one of its own soon.

ONTARIO INSTITUTE NOTES.

Richmond Hill Institute gives books and prizes to the pupils of the school for punctuality and regular attendance.

Beaconsfield has placed wash basins in the local school and keeps the school supplied with paper towels.

Aurora Institute gives prizes at the School Children's Fair for home-made baking and canning of fruit.

At Slate River there is an old hall which is being moved on to a new site and the Institute purposes remodelling it and putting a library into it.

Thorndale Institute started a public library there and they keep adding new books each year.

Sheffield Institute donates a sum of money annually to the maintenance of the Galt Rest Room.

Howland No. 1 (near Little Current, on Manitoulin Island), is co-operating with the U.F.O. in buying a Community Hall.

Birkendale Institute is co-operating with the other Institutes in North Muskoka, in supporting a Rest Room at Huntsville, which is supplied with stove wood, chairs, lounge, trundle bed, toilet, etc.

Hope Bay and Hopeness (in Bruce County), supplied the two schools in their locality with wash basins, towels, soap dish, and soap.

A Junior Institute, formed at Maynard, meets with the Senior Institute every three months, besides holding regular meetings by themselves.

Barnhart Institute (in Rainy River District), has an Institute woman on the School Board, and has given prizes for efficiency to pupils.

Alford, Park and Governor's Road Institute interested the girls in their locality in a shower for the Children's Shelter in Brantford, to which they responded liberally.

Horning's Mills Institute repaired and enlarged the old Workman's Hall, and now have a nice comfortable hall suitable for a village.

Cherry Grove Institute (near Markdale), has helped the local school by introducing the hot lunch, providing for the painting and decorating of the interior of the school and are helping to the extent of $100 in the building of a shed in the school yard. They purpose having a well on the school grounds.

THANKS FROM THE C. N. I. B.

In a letter recently received by Mr. Putnam, Supt. of Ontario Institutes, from the Secretary of the Canadian Institute for the Blind, that official writes:

"In again bringing to your notice the work and aims of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, we take this opportunity to express to the Women's Institutes of Ontario, our keen appreciation of the great interest taken by them in the work for the amelioration of the blind and also to thank them for their splendid response to our appeals for funds."

of all voters in his sub-division, and as one comes to vote, he or his clerk hands him a ballot paper. As the ballot is secret, the voter goes into the booth alone and marks his cross opposite the name or names he wants to vote for. He comes out and hands his ballot to the deputy-returning officer, who removes the counterfoil and drops the ballot in the box. The poll clerk marks "voted" on the list after the voter's name. Any mark on the ballot more than the cross after the desired candidate's name ruins the ballot, and the vote is lost.

To guard against buying of votes, or other interference with the just conduct of elections, there is a heavy penalty imposed on anyone who offers, receives or asks for money, position, or other reward for a vote.

All campaign expenses must be borne by the candidate or his friends. He must have an agent who keeps account and pays all lawful expenses. After the election these expenses must be published in a newspaper of the constituency. A by-election must sometimes be held in a constituency owing to the seat becoming vacant by the death or resignation of a sitting member of the House. The same rules govern this as in a general election.

TO observers of general conditions, it seems quite apparent that the opportunities which existed, to secure large speculative profits from stocks which developed extraordinary earnings, is over. The banks of Canada and the United States have adopted a loaning policy, which, if adhered to, means that conservative undertakings based on permanent lines will first be served with funds. The speculator must pick up money where he can, and at high rates of interest. This is in itself, sufficient in the way of guidance to the average man or woman who desires to do the right thing at the right time with his funds. Purchasers of securities from now until the period of world deflation is well advanced will apparently serve their own interests best by adopting a more or less conservative policy beforehand. Of course, my theory is that investment is investment all the time; that is to say, the best results in the long run will be obtained by the purchaser of securities of the first grade, because he is sure his capital is safe, and always liquid, and even if his annual return seems small compared to some speculative results, it actually is not small because it is continuous.

The person committed to speculation, that is, who is always endeavoring to so place his funds that he will get a return out of the ordinary, picks his plums, but has many a set back. In fact, the public would be surprised if they could go over the annual statements of a hundred speculators picked at random, and note what a small yearly return is shown on the entire capital invested. On the other hand, the policy of slow, steady accumulation, with practically no losses, produces surprising results.

To the buyers of the more solid securities, many opportunities offer. One may now take advantage of the high interest rate to lodge funds for a fairly long term in "Gilt-edge" bonds affording the greatest security with an ample income over a fixed term of years. For instance, I notice an issue of the Government of the Province of New Brunswick 6% coupon gold bonds. A coupon bond means that the holder detaches a perforated coupon from his bond, presents it at the bank on the due date, printed on the coupon, and is paid his interest money. The term "gold" means the principal of the bond, and usually the interest also, is payable in gold coin. But while it is usual to include the term "gold" in the clauses of a bond, it is not at all certain that a demand for gold will produce gold. In fact, there has been no gold paid out to the public as currency during the war period, or at present. These New Brunswick bonds carry interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum. They are denominations of One Thousand dollars, are dated May 1, 1920, and mature May 1, 1930. Thus, the buyer of these bonds can lay out a thousand dollars to bring in a stated income for the fixed period of ten years. His return will be a little over six per cent., 6 1/4% to be exact, as the bonds are selling at 99.08.

When a Government bond is offered to yield a trifle over six per cent. it would naturally follow that securities rated not so highly by the banking and investment market would have to offer even a greater incentive in the way of interest return to cause the public to absorb them. A case in point exists in another new issue, the 6% bonds of Abitibi Power & Paper Company. These are General Mortgage (not First Mortgage) 6 per cent. bonds, which have forty years to run. They mature in 1940. The price is 92 1/2 and the yield is about 6.70 per cent. The student of investment, who may be in the early stages, will observe that there are all classes of bonds, with their points of strength and weakness, and that the best of them command the highest price, and the most uncertain of them have to be offered away under the market price of the best. The points to be watched in a bond purchase are many, and the subject will be taken up again.

The common mistake is, through lack of knowledge of what the different securities mean, to enter upon a speculation with the idea that it really is investment. To illustrate again: A widow, on the advice of a broker, put a large sum into common stock of Toronto Railway Company. She has lost two-thirds of her money already. This buyer assumed she was "investing" her funds. Any one thoroughly understanding investment would have advised her that she was speculating in a stock which was not then apparently worth its market price, and in so far as safety to capital was concerned, appeared to offer so little substantial backing as to render this common stock quite dangerous to buy.

KLIM

is pure pasteurized separated milk in the most convenient and economical form in which you can buy it—a dry powder.

You can buy Klim from your nearest grocer. It is packed in handy blue and white striped tins in half pound, one pound and ten pound sizes.

Get a tin today. Read the directions. Lift off the cover. Scoop out eight level tablespoonfuls of Klim and place it on top of a pint of water in a bowl. Whip briskly until all is dissolved. It takes just a few seconds. Taste it. You'll be delighted with the natural flavor.

Klim makes delicious biscuits, cakes, sauces, and milk soups. Use it wherever you have been using liquid milk in cooking and baking and you'll be delighted with its convenience and economy. The small amount of fat in Klim powdered separated milk is not detrimental when it is used for cooking and baking, because it is more economical to use fat in the form of butter. It is the general custom for the housewife to use the balance of the milk for cooking after taking the top off the bottle for the table.

Klim remains fresh and sweet down to the bottom of the tin. Keep the cover on and tuck the tin away in the kitchen cabinet or wherever it is handy. No need to put it on ice. Hot weather does not affect its goodness. Go away over the week-end, or for a month; when you come home there's a supply of sweet separated milk all ready by adding the water.

For summer houses and for camping-out trips, take a generous supply of Klim along. It's light to carry. Clean to handle. Use as you need it. Always good.

KLIM (brand) Powdered Whole Milk contains all of the fat of the original rich whole milk from which it was made. Because of its richness in fat the product is not sold by grocers but is sold direct to the user. Clip out the order form below and send to our nearest office. ## A Prima Donna in the Bud

Glimpses of the Childhood of Madame Albani, the First Eminent Canadian Singer

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

THE public career of the famous Canadian prima donna, Emma Albani, is part of the world's knowledge. It is permanently embodied in all biographical dictionaries which include the musical celebrities of the nineteenth century. This article, however, deals with that portion of her life which is of more intimate interest to her fellow countrymen—her childhood and girlhood in Chambly and Montreal. It is a tale that should be of interest to ambitious Canadian girls everywhere, though for but one in a million can destiny hold such blessings as it did for little Marie Cecile Emma Lajeunesse, daughter of the village organist of Chambly, an old settlement on the Richelieu River in southern Quebec.

First, one will summarize briefly the events that made her in the latter part of the nineteenth century one of the most renowned women of her time. She was born at Chambly on November 1st, 1852, and is now living in honored retirement in London. The beauty of her voice, and her talent as a musician, became known while she was a little child, and after the removal of her father to Albany while she was a girl in her teens, she developed such promise that in 1869 funds were raised to send her to Paris and Milan for study. She made such rapid progress that she was able to make her debut in grand opera at Messina, Sicily, in 1870, before her eighteenth birthday. The following year she won success at Florence, Italy, and Valetta, Malta, and her position was established from the night of her first appearance at Covent Garden, London, on April 2nd, 1872, as Amina, in Bellini's "La Sonnambula." Triumphs in Paris, St. Petersburg and many other centres followed, and for twenty years she was a great favorite with the British public, in operatic and oratorio roles, and became a close personal friend of the late Queen Victoria. She also received many orders, decorations, gifts and other marks of distinction from royal personages all over Europe. About twenty-five years ago she retired from the operatic stage, but continued to appear in concert, making several successful tours of Canada during the later nineties. Her farewell appearance was made at Albert Hall, London, in 1911, and she received a great ovation from a public which had held her in esteem for nearly forty years. In her long career she sang a great number of the leading soprano roles in opera, many of them (including the more important Wagnerian roles) for the first time in London. It is regrettable that, though she became famous at an earlier age than most prima donnas, the full quality of her voice commenced to wane shortly after her fortieth year. In the case of Melba, Patti, and several other prima donnas of the first rank, there has been phenomenal preservation of tone quality, which was denied her. Of her greatness during the period covered by 1872-1895 there has never been any question. Her fine personal character and happy married life with her husband, the late Edward Gye, a noted impresario, whom she married in 1878, also helped to make her universally respected.

The story of her childhood is to be found in her autobiography, published in 1911, the year of her farewell to the public. Though most of her life had been spent in London, she still cherished precious memories of the sound of the rapids of the Richelieu

River, and the sight of old Fort Chambly, which had been familiar to her in babyhood. It is indeed one of the most beautiful spots in North America, whether in winter or summer. Her father, Joseph Lajeunesse, was a French-Canadian, of Breton descent, and a skilled performer on the organ, violin, harp and piano. Her mother, Melina Mignault, was of French and Scottish descent, and an excellent amateur musician as well. On her mother's side the tradition of the full quiver prevailed. Madame Lajeunesse was the eldest of twelve children, and little Emma played with aunts as young as herself, as well as with many family connections.

The musical training of the child was begun by her mother, when she was but four years old, and when she was five the father took her education in hand in a true professional spirit. Albani says: "The early days of my childhood were so taken up with study that I had little time to play, but I can well recall the occasion on which my childish mind woke up, as it were, to the extreme beauty of nature, and the lovely scenery which surrounds my early home. It was once when I had been away for some time, and on my return I seemed suddenly to see and to feel the wonders of nature, and the marvellous beauty all around me. It spoke to me for the first time as music was speaking to me, and in every country where I have travelled since the beauty of nature speaks to me still."

Albani never had a doll, and even at the age of five worked at her music four hours a day. Her tasks seem cruel enough to-day, when thought is turned on the problem of making child life free of care, but she does not seem to have pined under it. The father was insistent on patience and exactitude in practice, and when friends protested that he was subjecting the child to a strain too severe for her years, his answer was a laugh. The daughter used to laugh too, in after years, when she found herself so thoroughly equipped for a career.

There was fun in her life also, for the home was a happy one, with plenty of juvenile society, and an aunt who used to devise little plays based on French-Canadian legends, which Emma and her little friends would act sometimes for the pleasure of the English residents of Chambly. And even as a little tot the sweetness of her voice won local fame.

When she was in her eighth year the kind young mother died, and Emma was sent to the Convent of the Sacred Heart, at Montreal, where her father was already a teacher of music. And in the love of the kindly old nuns she found recompense for the loss of her mother. Indeed it was to the good sense of the Mother Superior that she in part owed the direction which her ambitions took. When she first arrived at the Convent the good sisters were astonished to find that a child so young was so advanced in music. After the first term it was necessary in fairness to the other pupils, to debar her from competitions. A child who could read at sight almost all the works of the old masters assuredly placed her fellow pupils under an insurmountable handicap.

One compensation she had, however. She was permitted to play a small demon in one of the religious plays given at the Convent, and did so in such a spirit of earnest mischief that she at last gave way to excitement and had to be carried off to bed hysterically crying—an early exhibition of that dramatic temperament which in after years gave fervor to her stage creations. The Mother Superior of this Convent, an Italian lady of high education, seems to have been a wise and discerning woman. Emma's relatives had conceived the idea that she had a vocation for the religious life, and the girl assumed that a nun-nery was her destiny. The Mother Superior, whose musical enthusiasms were so strong that she used to shed tears of delight when her charge would sing noble compositions, urged strongly that a girl with so beautiful a voice owed it to the world to develop and use God's gift, but promised that, if at some future time she felt the need of the convent life, she would receive her. At the age of twelve the public appearance of the future prima donna began in Montreal, not only as a singer, but as a performer on piano and harp, and she speedily acquired a local celebrity.

At the age of fourteen her life as a Canadian school girl ended, with the removal of her father to Albany, N.Y., and from the time of her arrival there it was assumed that she was to adopt a professional career. She obtained employment as soprano soloist of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church of that city, where she sang the difficult masses of the great composers, and was in demand as a concert singer. Albani is emphatic that singing in public at this age does not injure a girl's voice if she has been properly taught how to use and not abuse the voice, but to my own way of thinking, this early experience may account for the comparatively early decline of her powers. If I mistake not, Patti was kept by her mother from public appearances during the period of adolescence, though as a child she had been a phenomenal singer, and astonished the world when she returned to the stage at the age of seventeen.

Her experience as a choir singer at Albany, however, had the fortunate result of interesting the diocesan Bishop, Mgr. Conroy, and through his influence funds were raised to send her to Europe for study. In Paris she came under fortunate auspices, for one of the nuns at the Sacred Heart Convent at Montreal had given her a letter of introduction to the Baroness de Lafitte. This noble lady nursed her through an attack of typhoid fever, which assailed her on her arrival in Paris, and on recovery introduced her to the leading musical and artistic circles of the French capital, then all unconscious of the doom that was to overtake the city and the brilliant reign of Napoleon III. Duprez, the great tenor, taught her, and through Madame de Lafitte the young Canadian girl was enabled to see the Empress Eugenie. "I was," says Albani, "invited to one of the last Imperial balls ever given at the Tuilleries, and I can well recall the extreme beauty of the Empress. I shall never forget her as she came in, dressed in pure white, with pearls and diamonds, and looking the true Queen of Beauty she actually was at that time."

In later years Albani was to know the Empress as an exile in England.

The Economical Covering for Your Furniture is Craftsman Fabrikoid

ARE you the mother of kiddies whose romping about the house has played havoc with the furniture? Upholstery torn, cut, stained? Frames good, but coverings in a horrible state? Craftsman Fabrikoid will replace the old coverings and make the furniture good as new—in fact it will probably outlast the furniture itself.

Half the furniture you have seen covered with what you believed to be leather was Fabrikoid. It is difficult to distinguish between the two as far as appearance is concerned, for Fabrikoid is grained, pebbled and colored the same as leather. But it has advantages that leather does not possess. Leather must be accepted as it comes from the cow—Fabrikoid is built up to a fixed standard. Leather is hard in some spots, soft in others, absorbs grease and water, becomes stained and frequently rots and tears. Fabrikoid is uniformly the same, yard after yard—pliable, tough and absolutely impervious to water or grease—and above all, costs far less.

Make your furniture upholstery permanent with Fabrikoid. Save money and make the chairs, cushions, lounges and couches kiddie-proof with this attractive covering.

Your furniture dealer can supply it—he can do the work. Write us for further information about Fabrikoid and what can be done with it in your home and they are doing splendidly. Crab apple seeds brought from Ottawa were planted eight years ago, and while the trees are growing, they have not borne fruit as yet. To England, Mrs. Thompson sent for foxgloves, and hollyhocks, without which no English-woman's garden would be complete, and the pinks, pansies and larkspurs also came from the home gardens.

An English Garden in Northern Alberta

BORDERING the garden which is over an acre in size, is a splendid hedge of honeysuckle, pretty in flower, then when the flower has gone, it is still beautiful with its profusion of bright red berries. In addition to the apple trees, there are black, red and white currants of various sorts and varieties, one of the white currant bushes growing from seed sent from England; asparagus, rhubarb, strawberries of different varieties, saskatoons, cranberries, Russian pines, and various other varieties of local and transplanted trees.

While Mrs. Thompson got seed from England, from Eastern Canada and the States, she has also been quick to recognize the beauty of the local shrubs, such as the saskatoon, cranberry and blueberry and has added them to her collection. There are now good sized maples that were started from seed like everything else. So readily have the raspberry bushes, the currant bushes and others multiplied, that in addition to greatly enlarging her own garden, Mrs. Thompson has given a start to her two daughters, who are making gardens of their own, in practically the same neighborhood.

These daughters married since coming to Canada, and settled on farms near the mother's home. Like their mother, they are very happy in the Canadian home and have taken most readily to the different conditions. Two were left alone during the war and while Lieutenant Roberts, M.C., has been safely restored to his family, Captain Meade, M.C., will not return, and his young wife is bravely carrying on the farm. But she has her garden, and expects soon to be able to rival her mother's. Like her mother, she does the work of the garden herself. It is a picture to see the little white-haired mother, out planning, planting and weeding her garden. It is the actual work she does, not just seeing that some one else does it.

Behind a hedge of poplars, maples and saskatoon bushes which form a wind break, is Bear Lake, which has the distinction in addition to having the only English garden on its shores, of being the only lake in all that part to have fish.

and many another crowned head beside—some of whom were destined in the late war to meet the same sorrows that came to Eugenie in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. During that conflict the young singer was fortunately in Italy, studying with Lamperti of Milan, to whom she attributes her artistic success. And it was through his kind offices that, when her money was running low, she obtained the engagement at Messina which led on to glory.

In ending the tale of her girlhood, it is worth while explaining why she took the name of Albani, which at one time was assumed to indicate a desire on her part to be known as an American, rather than a Canadian. When she was about to go to Messina it was decided that Lajeunesse was not an acceptable name for the Italian stage. Her elocution master promised to find her a good substitute, and hit upon the name of Albani, as one of an old Italian family, whose members, with the exception of an aged Cardinal, were all dead. He had never heard of such a city as Albany; but the happy coincidence impressed the girl as signifying luck, and forthwith she became Albani.

reason why you shouldn't indulge your interest in Art."

"What about your own interest in Art?" I asked dryly.

"Me? Ah, I'm going to give up sketching. One must concentrate. From now on I think of nothing but amuseances. Besides—well, you always were a blind little bat, Lina."

I didn't enquire what she meant. I am not quite blind either—it's only that I am afraid. I don't want to see things that may not be there. And he went away without a word!

"Yes, he did," said Katherine, answering my thought in that uneasy way she has—but I had not lost these dear so much loved I not military regulations more? He's like that, you know, Lina, a man's man every inch. If you are anything to him you'd be a great deal, but you'll never be what Harold calls 'the whole cheese.'"

"Half a cheese—" I began, but the telephone bell interrupted me.

"Long distance—run!" said Katherine.

I DON'T know how Katherine guessed. But it was!

A moment before he had been so far away. Now he was in the very room. His voice spoke in my ear.

"Is it you, Lina?" I knew what it sounded so breathless. Mine was the same. I could hardly manage to stammer a faltering "yes."

"I couldn't see you before I left," the breathless voice went on, "but I thought you might understand. Do you?"

"N-no—I—y-yes."

"Good! You're a brick, Lina! Say, Lina, do you remember how I used to look at you in school?"

"You were—very rude."

"Then you did notice it! I never could feel sure. What I want to say is that I've never really looked at anyone else. You've always taken up all the sky line, Lina. Do I make it clear?"

"Y-yes."

"Couldn't you register a little more conviction?"

"Yes."

"Could you say 'Jim'?"

"Yes—Jim."

"You see I didn't allow for Harold. He was an accident and delayed things rather. But I felt it was only temporary."

"Oh!"

"What did you say?"

"I said, 'Oh!'"

"But what does it mean in English?"

"It means that your modesty amazes me."

"Well—I say! I couldn't help seeing that you were bored to death, could I? Harold too?"

"Indeed!"

"Well—weren't you? Hello! Are you there? Lina—"

"Don't yell, Jim."

"Oh, dash it! This telephoning isn't nearly as simple as I thought. Lina, I'm going to get special leave—just a day. But I can't wait till then. Will you marry me, Lina? Hello! Hello! No, Central, I've not finished—get off the line! Hello! Lina—"

"Yes, Jim?"

"Does that mean you will?"

"Yes, Jim."

"Good! You really are a brick, Lina. I know I'm not doing it right. But I'll do it all over when I get there. This is just—just—"

"Just making sure of your option?" I suggested smoothly. (I was quite cool now.)

"Oh, I say, don't! A fellow can't get back through this hanged telephone—and there's the bugle! Of all the—I've got to stop. Lina!"

Even for the joy of teasing him I couldn't resist that note in his voice.

"It's all right, Jim," I said quietly.

The telephone clicked. He was gone—to answer the bugle.

I hung up the receiver thoughtfully. There would always be a bugle with Jim. I knew that. But there are women and women, and men and men—and somehow I like the man who hears the calling of bugles!

It was washing day and John had been kept from school to look after the baby. Mother sent them into the garden to play, but it was not long before cries disturbed her. "John, what is the matter with baby, now?" she inquired from the washtub. "I don't know what to do with him, mother," replied John; "he's dug a hole and wants to bring it into the house."

"if I could only see him, I would know him surely. I could tell his face—sharp and cold, like those scissors things he must use. But one wouldn't care about that. It is the brains behind the face that matter."

Alice Dickson laughed again.

"Are you sure?" she asked.

"Sure as a die," Jeanie affirmed.

"Why, one would know his face in a thousand. And if that failed, there would be the smell."

"The smell?"—in surprise.

"Yes—the human drug store, medicine chest, chloroform smell. But one wouldn't mind that either."

"I wish I could introduce you—but—"

"There is always a 'but,'" Jeanie frowned. "And it butts. It isn't so much missing him now, since my nose led me to you. Miss Cornelia Harding will be home in three days. How shall I explain?"

"I shall tell her I called."

"Yes—the next morning."

"And that is just the part I will not tell her."

"You are a dear," cried Jeanie Wren. "And I am going home right this minute to put another 'God bless you' into my prayers."

It was Tots, three years old, blissful, baby Tots, who came crawling through the hedge next morning, right into the back yard of Miss Cornelia Harding—novelist; and spying the one and only Human Story Lady in a far corner, he made a bee-line straight through the aster bed towards her.

"Bumper's comin'," he screamed in frantic delight. "Bumper's comin'."

Jeanie looked puzzled indeed.

"Bumper?" she questioned.

"Yep—Bumper—" breathlessly.

"When?"

"Now—right now"—he thrust out a letter. Jeanie took it dubiously.

"Mudder sended it," he told her.

So Jeanie Wren hastened to read, and this is just exactly what she read:

"Dear Human Story Lady:—Our dear family brother is arriving today. Please do come over for supper. It is the children's treat, and they want you."

ALICE D.

"Our dear family brother," she repeated. "Tots,"—she looked about quickly, but Tots was of the invisible. "Tots,"—she ran around to the hedge and caught him half way through the hole—"Tots—is he—the Bumper—your uncle?"

"Yes—he ain't," said Tots, squirming from her grasp.

"What's the hurry, Tots?" she called, watching him scurry away.

"Yes—it ain't," he yelled, never looking behind him.

Jeanie was sore puzzled.

"He must be some uncle to make Tots move," she thought. "I just bet he is there now."

MISS JEANIE WREN went moodily into the house, into the cool and dark recesses of the drawing-room. You see she was a little bit frightened of her own thoughts, and endeavored thus to hide them. She was worried—dismayed. This Bumper man must be quite a chap indeed to make Tots run away from her. And she didn't want to meet any big folks in there. The Dicksons were all so dear and friendly and human.

"It's the children's treat," she repeated. "And mine too, I guess. Two days of freedom, and then we begin—Miss Cornelia and the typewriter and I—Miss Sylvia's Romance." Oh, drat it anyway."

The Wren part came out victorious at length. She knew what she knew.

"If he is a snub, I'll be a snub too," she declared. "And if he takes the kiddies from me—I'll fight like a—like a cat for them. And if he is nice and decent and chummy—well—Jeanie Wren, do you know which is your best foot—to put it forward?"

It was four o'clock to the minute when Jeanie Wren, winsome and alluring, in her best white crepe de Chine, with the black velvet bands, made her way across the Dickson's side lawn to the verandah. Doris and a man were ascending the steps.

"Hello, you folks," she called. "Just a minute—I'm coming."

Instantly the man turned about.

"Are you the one and only Human Story Lady?" he hailed.

"I am," was the quick response. "And you are—the Bumper." The children's treat it was indeed, and some grown-ups are forever children. They played on the lawn, they raced in the back yard, and at six they went in to supper. Jeanie Wren declared "It was all so right, it didn't seem it could be right." And after supper they sang in the softly lit drawing-room, with mother Dickson at the piano.

"It's just too lovely," Doris breathed ecstatically, when it came time for them to go up to bed—"It's just too lovely to stop it."

For compensation the Story Lady went up with them, trailing a long string of stories behind her. It would have been nice indeed—nice and proper and usual, had not Tots started the trouble.

"I wants the Bumper up here too," he pleaded, "to bump us on the beds."

"Maybe to-morrow night," Jeanie reasoned.

"No—now," he persisted. "I wanna bump now."

"But—"

Fred came manfully to the rescue.

"I'll get him," he yelled, and bolted for regions below. He came back presently—triumphantly—the Bumper with him.

And then the trouble began. He bumped them on the beds—he bumped them on the floor—he bumped them into the air—did this man. And such shrieks—such long, delicious howls—you never heard before. Jeanie watched near-by, helpless with laughter.

As quickly as the fun began, just as quickly did it cease. He bumped them with a last bump into their little white beds, and all became exceedingly quiet. The Story Lady knew her turn had arrived. She waited—just as long as she dared—for the Bumper to go down stairs. But he was a wise man. He went to Fred's bed and seated himself comfortably.

"Now for our story," he said.

"Tell us the one about the Fairy Happiness," Doris begged.

"Well, once upon a time," the Story Lady began bravely, and no one there knew how brave she was really trying to be—"Well, once upon a time there was a Little Fairy and she lived with all the other fairies in the dell of Make Believe. But the Little Fairy was not happy; she could not sing joyously as the others, nor could she dance so lightly. And when she worked her heart was heavy; sometimes she even cried. So one day she went to the Fairy Queen and begged:

"Please—please let me go away, where I can be happy."

"So the Fairy Queen smiled and gave her a little gold key.

"It unlocks the only door to Happiness," she said softly. "And when you come to the right door, the key will fit—the door will open."

"And the key was—" Doris suggested.

Jeanie Wren hugged her and smiled.

"And the key was Loving," she continued. "So the Little Fairy went out from the dell of Make Believe to the real world.

"Far she travelled, over the hills, and down into the valleys, and into the cities. And everywhere she went she could find no door for the key. At the houses where she danced with the real people, the locks were all too big; and where she worked sometimes, for she worked to earn her daily bread, there were no locks on the doors for her key. All the shop doors were bolted at nights with heavy iron bolts. Though the Little Fairy pretended all the day long that she was happy, she knew it was a lie, because happy people never, never, cry under the sheets at night, as the Little Fairy did.

"One day she could bear it no longer—she wanted to run back—all the way back—to her own people. So early one morning she started out for the dear dell of Make Believe. She was tired when she started, so tired at times, that she feared she could never return. But lo!—the nearer she drew to home, the better she felt—the happier. And when all the Fairies in the dell saw her coming from a long way off, they hastened about in all directions to prepare a welcome for her.

"There was feasting and much dancing and glorious singing, when the Little Fairy returned. Bless me—she sang lovelier than any of them—and dance!—oh, how light and happy her step was! Then the Fairy Queen called for the little gold key.

"I could not find one door in all the world," said the Little Fairy sadly, as she gave it back.

"But the Queen smiled, for she was wise. She beckoned the Little Fairy to her. And the gold key of Loving fitted the lock of the Little Fairy's own heart.

"Now," spoke the Queen to the assembly, 'since her heart door is open to all the world, she shall be known as the Fairy Happiness.'

"Oh—" breathed Doris—"Oh,—and it means—don't forget that, Story Lady."

"It means," the Story Lady's voice was low—"that only within our hearts can we find our real happiness, in being good and kind and loving."

There was an intense silence.

"Gee," Fred suddenly ejaculated, "ain't she a squelcher?"

They looked to Tots for answer, but he was sound asleep, away in the dell of Make Believe.

THEY left them presently—the Bumper Man and the Story Lady, and went out to the real, real world. In the hall at the top of the stairs he paused. She paused too—because—well, I suppose her nose stopped leading her.

"Why don't you write stories like that instead of—instead of novels?" he asked.

"Because I don't write novels."

"But you live next door," he amended. "They told me so. Aren't you Miss Harding?"

Up went Jeanie Wren's hands in a gesture of dismay. "Call me any thing but that," she said.

"Then you are not?"—eagerly.

"Never was—never will be," she assured him. "Why, I am just her secretary—ordinary Jeanie Wren."

In the dim light he caught her hands.

"Say, but it's great," he exclaimed. "I didn't want you to write novels like hers and all the time I thought you were doing it anyway. Do you come over here often?"

"Every day—since nearly two weeks."

"Do you tell a story like that every night—in just that way?"

"Why—yes—" she nodded.

"Say," he asked—"are you coming to-morrow night?"

THE END.

again with words and theories. Could the man never be practical? Could he never learn of life as it was?

"I am only now beginning to know Lena," he said, breaking in upon my thoughts.

I glanced at him quickly. What did he mean? Had she come back then? Where was Lena? I had not seen her nor had he given me the faintest idea that she had returned.

"Where is she?" I asked, curiously. He shook his head.

"I don't know," he said dejectedly.

"I can't find a trace of her. Every clue ends in failure."

"But then—" I began.

"What I mean to say," he explained, "is that when I sit and think of her now, I no longer think of her actual features, of the colour of her hair, or the contour of her face . . . and I see the real beauty of Lena. It's something quite different," he went on, "the actual beauty of Lena is something which I can't talk about, something I know and feel, and yet can't find words to express. Oh God!" he said suddenly, and I noticed how his shoulders were bowed as beneath the weight of the whole world's woe. "Do you think I shall ever be able to find her?"

That was what I was beginning to wonder myself, as time went by.

He came in late one evening and sat down without lighting his pipe. To my offer of tobacco or cigarettes he shook his head.

"I just came over to say good-bye," he said. "I'm sailing in the morning."

"Sailing," I inquired, astonished.

"Yes," he said, "I have an idea that Lena has gone abroad. I am going to look for her until I find her."

THE END.

"Yes—I suppose so."

"Well—I am coming too."

"You silly man," she gasped—"You silly man."

And down the stairs she sped, all new laughter and dreaming. For she felt just as the Little Fairy felt, when the key of Loving opened the door of her heart.

Out on the verandah was Alice Dickson and father Dickson. They seemed to be laughing, and Jeanie wondered why father Dickson rose so suddenly and hurried away out upon the lawn. Jeanie Wren sank into his place. A long, long while of silence.

"Well," at length, for Alice. "Did you have a good time?"

"The children did,"—Jeanie snuggled down among the cushions—"Couldn't you hear them?"

The mother laughed.

"Hear them—I should say we did hear them. And you—didn't you like it too? Bumper is the limit sometimes."

"Yes,"—Jeanie reached her arms high above her head. "He is the limit. I am lots wiser now, than I was."

Alice started.

"You see," Jeanie went on, "I've learned that being somebody isn't the only thing. You know how wild I was just to look at that Dr. Kerby, with his sharp, scissory face, and his drug shop personality, when the world is truly filled with real people—all being somebody in their own way. Unless celebrities are first of all humans—they don't count much with me any more."

"What story did you tell—the Happiness one—did Doris ask you, and did Tots play his part well, too?"

Jeanie Wren sat up suddenly.

"Yes—Doris did ask," she admitted.

"How did you know? And Tots—what did he play?"

"Would you mind if I told you that all of us—all of the Dicksons only, planned just to-night?"

"Because—why?"

"Because of you—and—Dr. Bumper Kerby."

Another long silence.

"Glory—glory—was that him?" Jeanie's voice was very trembly.

"Yes—do you mind?"

"Mind—" there was low laughter—"Oh, mother Alice Dickson—I could just kiss you for doing it."

"And so could I," called the illustrious Dr. Kerby from the hallway.

and "Rainbow Valley." Her books have sold into the tens of thousands and there is no more popular writer throughout the Dominion of Canada.

ONE of the best liked writers in Canada, Mrs. Nellie L. McClung, whose novels, "Sowing Seeds in Danny," "The Second Chance," "The Next of Kin," and "Three Times and Out," have been so widely read, declares that she has no particular method in writing. "I write," she told the writer, "when I feel like it and have never been able to 'grind it out.' It comes easy or it does not come at all. I have never made any study of the technique of story writing, my plan being to just listen and watch people and then write it down. I simply write about the people I meet and set down their stories as faithfully as I can."

Mrs. McClung's favorite authors are Charles Dickens and Robert Louis Stevenson. "I do not like mystery stories or problem stories," was the emphatic statement of the western writer. "I like simple tales of real life, preferably those which end happily."

In answer to my query, Mrs. McClung stated that her hobbies were few. "I take an interest in sheep and collie dogs and general out-door life. One of the most attractive odors I know is the smell of bacon frying under the poplar trees. My personal history is just the same as ordinary folks'. My husband and I are always on speaking terms, I like all my relations, and while I am a Methodist in religion I am not real sure of my politics." Besides owning and managing her own sheep ranch, along with her literary activities, Mrs. McClung also successfully manages a pretty home on the outskirts of Edmonton where a husband and four children claim her first attention.

Among the writers who have secured a large and ever increasing reading public in recent years is Mrs. Isabel Ecclestone Mackay, whose three novels, "The House of Windows," "Up the Hill and Over," and "Mist of Morning," have had a wide appeal. Mrs. Mackay wrote poetry before she wrote prose and it was poetry of a very high standard. Her book of child verse entitled "The Shining Ship," has been almost as popular as her novels. Mrs. Mackay tells me that her methods in writing are many and various. "I write when and where and in whatever manner I get the chance," she declares, "and such holidays as I am lucky to get are spent in camp, for I have found roughing it to be both restful and refreshing. I enjoy anything in modern literature that is well done, from an educational treatise by Wells to the style-marked fascination of Conrad."

MRS. EMILY F. MURPHY, known to the reading public as "Janey Canuck," is one of the outstanding names in present day Canadian literature. While she has written few books, "Janey Canuck in the West," "Open Trails," and "Seeds of Pine," these volumes have been published in Great Britain, Australia, and Canada, and have had a very wide sale. Quite recently "The London Bookman" declared that Mrs. Murphy's philosophy had "literally sung its way through the Dominions." "Her work," says "The Bookman," "is the song of the open road. The refrain of the wind-swept places is in her work. It is not style that matters in the work of Janey Canuck any more than it matters in the work of Walt Whitman—a kindred philosopher. She is a philosopher of gladness and content and common sense—a philosophy as durable as Bergsonism. 'The Open Trails' is a rubric—a book that makes you want to go and bury your face in the cool brooks, to hear blackbirds and robins piping against the clear skies; to be a brother to the wind, the lover of the stars; to breathe the freedom of sun-washed spaces and to follow the trail through the fragrant pine woods and winding mossy ways."

"My methods of working?" asked Mrs. Murphy in reply to my query. "Let me see. I am not sure but perhaps if you said I wrote in the present tense and in many moods you would come near it. I do not write if I am tired, annoyed, or laboring under a sense of hurry. When I am thinking out my work I often play the piano, work in my garden, turn over some of my collections, or do some housework. I am a slow writer—at least I think I am—and keep continually amending my work, cutting out phrases, paragraphs, and often whole pages. I have found that to spare the pen is not necessarily to spoil the picture. It was Kipling, wasn't it, who said, 'Only the gods can do things in a hurry.' I am always proud of getting my writing done for to me it means I have successfully conquered many allurements of life out west."

"I prefer spending my holidays alone," continued Janey Canuck. "I do not mean in absolute solitude but with a congenial friend. St. Augustine expressed the idea I am trying to give you when he said, 'Alpheus accompanied me, for his presence did not destroy my solitude.' I prefer a holiday in the mountains, on the prairies, or by the seaside—any place with wide spaces and open trails. But let me tell you a secret. As the years go by I am learning to take every day for a holiday. Any woman can do this if she knows how and keeps on practicing. I am trying to take life genially; instead of looking for pleasures I let them come to me. They may come through a sense of adventure as to what side of the street I take and what happened through my decision. They may come from a ruffle of drums, the play of lights on a surface, a chord of music, a shapely tree, the flower-like face of a child, or a spread of vivid color. The beauty of this kind of holiday is that you are happy nearly all the time, and get refreshment every foot of your way."

"MY preference in modern literature is rather difficult to answer. I will say though," said Mrs. Murphy with a smile, "that when pulling a book down off the shelf I more frequently find I have a Russian or Irish book in my hand than any other—that is, if it is not George Borrow. I also like reading translations of Persian, Chinese, and Hindoo writers. To follow on the trail of a unique mind, or to consider unusual themes with an author of two or three thousand years ago is a rare and unending delight. Maybe this so-called 'old literature' is really the newest kind after all. Anything is modern if it is ancient enough."

"I have no hobbies at all although I have done almost everything else in the world except brewing and deep-sea fishing. I have operated a furnace, a sewing machine, a foreign hired girl, women's clubs, a typewriting machine, the church bell and organ, timber limits, farms, coal mines, a kodak, a Ford car, and a Colt gun. I have marketed grain, preached sermons, planted gardens, painted pictures, broken bronchos, and killed hens. I have been through a real-estate boom, been through four major operations, lost in forests any number of times, cooked thousands of dinners, and now I am a police magistrate, a mother-in-law, and a score of other things of varying use or uselessness."

Mrs. Murphy is president of the Canadian Women's Press Club and the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada. For the past three years she has been police magistrate and Judge of the Juvenile Court of the Province of Alberta.

While Canadian writers of the sterner sex have enjoyed, and doubtless will continue to enjoy, a large demand for their work, the fact remains that in recent years feminine names on publishers' lists have been growing in number and at the present time there are a larger number of successful women novelists than there are men. Probably the answer to the situation is found in the fact that Canada is still busily engaged in developing her great natural resources. The present indications are that for some time to come women will play the preponderant part in any literature developed in the Dominion. At the present time "the opening up of the last frontier" seems to attract the vision of the male population and the writing of books by men is largely confined to professors or preachers.

The Lifted Hand

realized that he had thought enough to die.

The only thing which disturbed him in the spectacle of the courthouse was the gaze of the foreman of the jury nearly always fixed upon him. He was a young man in his thirties, once an artist, they said, who had married for money, paying the usual price for it. He expected nothing from a man who had done a thing like that. And there was something rude, he felt, in staring even at a prisoner. In a measure it might have been the light where he sat, which formed a sort of halo about his head—but his glance seemed mostly in his direction; not inquisitive, but quiet, perhaps even lazy—yet so often that he resented it as intrusion of his mood.

HE wondered in a practical way if the man was trying hypnotism, if he thought by such method to make him confess. He preferred the judge who was tired of it all and merely rested. Like himself, this man knew exactly how it would end. The jury's business was to convict—it had no need to stare. Or, if they must, let them make a target of his young attorney who was a firebrand—an unavailing one in the present instance, but very relishable for all. Somehow he felt that this man and he could have been friends, could have run together mentally very well. There was something terrier-like in his yelping force and interest, something splendidly dog-like and fearless in his loyalty. Certainly he had little evidence to assist him.

Standing there, facing them all, the prisoner often speculated as to just what had happened in that room after he left and who had actually killed the man. His interview had been pleasant enough. While he had rejected his play, Travers had spoken of it as being good. There had been nothing to quarrel about in any sense. The note he had written the actor the day previous had been merely abrupt, expressing impatience at not having found him at appointed times. It was temperamental, maybe, but not angry, though the District Attorney's office had read it so. Yet there must have been resentment back of the actor's mind. After he had left, he had evidently taken out the critique which the prisoner had published months before, and which he had no idea the other had seen. Following this he could not imagine what happened. Perhaps some ancient enemy had done the deed.

THE last afternoon of the trial dragged slower even than days past. The assistant District Attorney was finishing his address to the jury. A woman entered the courtroom bringing a pang to it. She was still very beautiful and she wept, seeing him there. He wondered if it wouldn't have been better if he had forgiven her. After all a woman is only a woman. He had not seen her for two years till now. The spring swung back with a clutching softness at his throat—the stars and moon of summer that dwell beneath everything somewhere, sometime in every man's blood. A tear fell on the back of his hand—a raindrop wrought from a sky of drouth. He was glad when she got up and left, apparently unable to stand it further. He could draw again about him the folds of life that no longer contained her. One cannot back past a tragedy if it has been one.

His eyes met the crowd again relieved. Then he saw another woman there he remembered—indistinctly at first, but it came to him suddenly. She had been the heroine of the play he had seen given at the society "benefit," the play Travers had told him he had begun to rehearse. He saw the foreman of the jury and this woman exchange a look—then he recognized the foreman as being the amateur who had played opposite her, endeavoring weakly to present a character too big for him. Instantly the whole scene flashed back to mind. He had forgotten almost plot and everything; even the actor telling him he had accepted the play had not caused him to recall it with any distinctness. Anyway he usually chose to remember only what pleased him, and this clouded effect, due to overworked emotions, had become a habitual curtain for many things in memory.

It came clear now though, startlingly clear—the third act; the tragedy so badly done yet with a suggestion of possibilities. Poor actors, both, the foreman of the jury and the lady! Casually, and despite the fact that it was a "benefit," he had slashed them in his little publication and spoken of unholy attempts at art when charity could get along as well by other means. Probably the foreman had read it—was that why he kept looking at him. It must have been at least eight months past.

THEN, he thought of a real actor in the part, the man who had been murdered, for instance. Why, it would be tremendous—a wonderful third act—he had not really looked into it before. No wonder Travers had chosen it to put on. With his art it would hit the height of the universe—that suicide scene which was the close. Good God! that was it! The man had killed himself! Every detail answered—the stiletto, how he was found! Upon his leaving he must have immediately started to rehearse. In the frenzy and art of the thing he had actually committed suicide. His intuitive grasp of character told him this was possible in such a nature. As he now remembered them the plea in the lines was soul-grIPPING. He rose to his feet white-faced, his hands uplifted. He felt the eyes of the foreman of the jury watching him. He faced him, his features convulsed with emotion, then succumbed. The judge, advising the jury, paused for a moment to regard him. Without further movement he sat with his head between his hands till the jury walked out to pass sentence upon him.

It was thirty-two hours before they came in. He waited this time numbly in his cell. Then he was led back to what he felt to be his last look on freedom. The same crowd seemed gathered but now like animals on edge for climax. He turned from them as one tired of them forever. The foreman arose addressing judge and courtroom.

"YOUR Honor," he stated, "there are eleven men for conviction. I, myself, stand alone for acquittal."

There was an instant buzz of speculative interest. An officer called out sharply for order. The judge sat regarding the foreman beneath frowning brows.

"Your stand as foreman against the other members of your jury is so unusual," he said, breaking the dramatic pause, "that I would be glad to have you state your reasons in court. It cannot affect the case in present status as the work of this jury is at an end."

"I am very glad, your Honor, to comply with your request. I shall do so in as few words as possible." Then with his audience grown strangely silent, he proceeded.

He told of appearing in the play which the actor had been rehearsing, of the sweeping power and influence of the climax; how the lines and terrible art of the thing sang itself into the blood of the man presenting it. He, himself, even as an amateur, had realized this power, though he knew that he had played the part poorly. A stiletto was the easiest way to suicide. It penetrated quickly, almost without pain. He knew Edmund Travers, had been a somewhat intimate friend. And his temperament was dramatic, yes, almost to frenzy. He could forget utterly, forget that he played. He had killed himself while rehearsing probably the greatest suicide ever written. This was the real solution of the tragedy. It was inspiration with him, let the evidence point to what it would—a blinding light that had broken over him and could not but be true. He felt that Providence was using his mind to protect the innocent, and he was certain of the prisoner's innocence as of his own. He knew that no ordinary jury would possibly acquit him, but he hoped that something would come up in the way of new evidence which would save the prisoner before another jury could pass verdict.

THE courtroom remained silent except for a woman sobbing her relief. Then restrained breathing broke to whispers in which some order of the judge was lost. The prisoner had listened, his senses swooning, his sight swept away in tears. He realized in that moment just how sweet life was. Then the soft, warm arms of the woman caressed him, holding him. And he grasped her hungrily as one grasps love and dawn out of Hell.

"No man or woman can live alone without bitterness," she breathed. "Through this awful trial Fate has brought me your forgiveness. It will never slay you now, dear; do not fear."

Her woman's intuition was entirely right. The maid who discovered the dead man had picked from the floor, with the idea of saving it from being blood-soiled, a newspaper that lay beneath his outstretched hand. Fortunately she had taken it to her own room and kept it, without thinking of it as part of the evidence. Later, when she examined it, she found scrawled in pencil indistinctly over the type—"I have killed myself accidentally—Travers."

guaranteed to pass the most critical examination of the most skeptical entomologist.

Taking it as a whole, however, the second-year course is not so strenuous as the first, but it is much smellier. This adjective of doubtful savor applies to the entomological department in a comparative degree and to the chemistry in the superlative. Even now in writing, one's handkerchief instinctively goes to one's olfactory organ as memory brings back recollections of preserved grasshoppers and caterpillars that had been defunct many moons before we were ever called upon to disinter the remains.

IT was in the chemistry room where one student proved her patriotic fervor in falling in with the Government's slogan: "Waste not." She was discovered with a bottle in one hand and a foot stripped of its usual covering in the other. On being questioned as to what particular experiment she was carrying on, she replied: "I had this bit of iodine over and I hated to waste it, so I am putting it on my corn." Truly, economy works in mysterious ways its wonders to perform.

A subject closely associated with chemistry which, as a rule, does not appeal to the feminine mind is physics. In this department, a series of lectures illustrated by lantern slides were given on the hydraulic ram and other hopelessly complicated machinery. So instructive was this course that at its conclusion some of the men students seriously entertained the thought of leaving the poverty-stricken teaching profession for the more lucrative one of plumbing. The professor in physics was as a voice in the rural districts, pleading that the hydraulic ram and complete water-system be installed on every farm in Ontario. From his remarks we learned that the farmer's wife would be chiefly benefited by this innovation, so she should see to it that her husband is given no peace until it has been installed.

ANOTHER subject which can be written about very briefly for the excellent reason that the writer knows little about it, is the study of certain vicious creatures one-thousandth of an inch in diameter and a mile or so in name. This is the unappetizing course in bacteriology, and those who are at all sensitive about eating millions of bugs with their daily food are not advised to attend the lectures; they were generally given the last hour before dinner—another instance of economy at the O.A.C.

But of all the lectures we were obliged to take in this upward climb towards the agricultural plum, there were none more popular than those on apiculture or the study of bees. Unfortunately, as the honeyflow had ceased before the session opened, the bees were hungry and consequently were in such an angry mood that all visitors to the apiary were apt to be received with stinging remarks. On this account it was not deemed advisable for us to obtain a knowledge of their habits from personal observations. But as the lecturers had devoted years to the study of these busy workers, we were perfectly willing to accept any statements they might make on the subject. One doubting Thomasina who went down to the apiary to do some investigating on her own account got badly stung and for two days and a night she bathed a swollen eyelid while she meditated on a new maxim that "not seeing is believing."

But on the whole the lecturers had reason to be greatly flattered by the splendid attention given them by the feminine portion of their audience. We all listened with wrapt interest to the words which dripped like honey from their lips—and well we might since we were learning things we had never learned before and which the lecturers, dear innocent creatures that they were, never dreamed they were teaching. For it was from them we discovered that in the hive of a bee woman suffrage reigns supreme and an ideal government is the result. What a revolution would be wrought in this man-governed world of ours if every hard-working woman who has a shiftless husband to support would follow the example of the bees in their treatment of the lazy, useless drone! In the words of Solomon one might say: "Go to the bee, thou woman-suffragist; learn of her ways and be wise."

AS each of the series of lectures was concluded, examinations were held in order to test the student's powers of absorption. These were really not intended to be taken seriously and the conscientious plodder who could not break off from the life-long habit of considering them the chief end of lectures was subjected to the friendly ridicule of her more adaptable friends. Thus it came about that no one could be found who would confess that she studied for them, and should one be caught in the act, she would feel as guilty as the small boy detected in the crime of reading "Tom Sawyer" concealed in his geography, and would hastily cover up her note-book or Bulletin No. 'nth and pretend to be deeply absorbed in some magazine. But as a rule, one's common-sense would carry one safely through an exam.—provided of course one had any. If not, a judicious amount of blarney tactfully administered might have the desired effect; for as one professor stated, "a little bit of soft soap goes a long way," and what examiner could resist this verse written at the conclusion of a paper:

And now I'm through, I hope that you
For me some marks will find;
You'll do your best at this request
Because you look so kind!

ACLOSE observer at the O.A.C. might have been inclined to believe that the habit of grousing had been transferred from the overseas army to the soldiers of Agriculture, for everywhere were heard protests against the tyrannous time-table which took such heavy toll from our waking minutes. That no sympathy could be expected from the lecturers was revealed in the remark of one who said that if the course were made lighter we would be deprived of one of our greatest pleasures, as we got at least twenty-five dollars worth of grumble out of it. Be that as it may, there was one subject—the most strenuous one at that—for which no examination was held, of which no one was ever known to complain, and to which one hastened with hurrying feet immediately after dinner, when by all the laws of good health one should refrain from violent exercise. This was the optional course in folk-dancing which had many earnest devotees. To such an extent did some of these enthusiasts carry their zeal, that they rose at six in the morning to practice their steps. Such industry is to be highly commended, and it is to be regretted that the indolent students in the rooms below did not take it in the right spirit, but objected strongly to having a dream of capturing beautiful butterflies changed into a nightmare of being caught in a terrible thunderstorm. This transition was invariably caused by the occupant of the room overhead practicing a dance to the tune of "The Irish Washerwoman"! Next year an agitation will likely be on foot to have all the devotees of the terpsichorean art confined to the ground floor where they may dance to the contentment of the heart and the destruction of the sole.

ANOTHER innovation of last year which it is hoped, will be made a permanent institution of the Summer Course was "Stunt Night," valuable for the revelation it gave of the superior dramatic talent which lies hidden and unsuspected in the bosom of the teaching profession. Our performance consisted of three distinct programmes as the First and Second Year Students were each responsible for one, while the Intermediates joined their forces to provide the third. As a prize of a huge box of chocolates was to be given for the best programme there was keen competition. No admission being charged, the audience was immense. So was the performance, it started at eight and ended at half-past eleven. No form of entertainment ever invented for the stage was omitted, although the tragedy was unintentional.

In spite of the fact that all the practicing had to be done in our leisure hours, those mythical leisure hours, the programmes were excellent, especially the second-year elementary's, which carried off the prize—a sweet triumph. Should the "Teachers' Wanted" columns be unusually long this summer, turn to the page on Music and Drama; there in the higher class of performance offered you will find the reason—the result of Stunt Night at the O.A.C.

Thus with its work and play, its hardships and pleasures, the weeks sped on until it was with a shock that we realized the end had come and we must say good-bye to friends we had known intimately for a few short weeks and whom, in all likelihood, we would never see again.

And now I am home once more. The ladder has been climbed, the plum has been plucked; I am the possessor of a Certificate in Agriculture and an incurable desire to pull up every weed I see, to name every tree that gives me shelter and to rub the seeds from every pod I brush against. Should an insect cross my path, my first impulse is to stoop and pick it up, but I restrain myself as I regretfully think: what a perfectly good bug going to waste!

very simple but satisfactory fireplace where had stood the old base-burner. This connected with a chimney in the attic. Several layers of paper, the accumulation of years, were scraped off and replaced by a buff-colored ingrain. Imitation oak disappeared under several applications of flat white, and the floor was treated to a deep wine-color. For thirteen dollars another local personage made me a very attractive corner cabinet with diamond panes which I also painted white. I had secured some satisfactory chintz for curtains, bright birds and foliage on a black ground.

Two of the bedrooms had paper that would at least not disturb one's slumbers by their racket, so this was left on as I had a very limited amount to expend. The third was a menace to any decent neighborhood, so I scraped it off and gave the walls a coating of tan tinting. In the attic I had found a quaint little bed which I bought for one dollar. It was of the old rope variety, but was made very comfy with modern springs. In the village I picked up two others of cottage type, one for $1.25, the other for $2. For sixty-five cents I bought a graceful little washstand. A chest of drawers of excellent design was procured for three dollars, and after an application of paint-and-varnish remover stood revealed as a really beautiful piece of wood and workmanship. I gave it several applications of linseed oil and turpentine, and it has been greatly admired. For five dollars each I secured two others which were in such good condition that nothing had to be done to them.

With some things that I had in my rooms at college I now had enough to go on with. A friend had given me six very good walnut chairs for the dining-room, and my local man made me a substantial table for four dollars. This, with the shelves he had made for my china, I stained walnut. In this room I had knocked down a flimsy and useless partition which left a room of unusual size with three deep windows.

The walls I papered blue, a color which harmonized with the wood-work. By some mistake this had been painted a delicate French grey by the former owner. Blue chintz curtains and my cheap but effective willow china completed the color scheme. I discovered a seat made out of an old walnut bed. I bought this for one dollar and it was quite transformed by blue chintz coverings and valance.

MY carpenter placed some shelves in the living-room. These I painted white and completed with curtains of habitant homespun purchased in Quebec. I also had temporary shelves put up in the bedrooms where I had no washstands.

Since buying the house I have picked up a number of useful old things—a walnut book-case which is to replace the shelves in the living-room; a clock over a hundred years old which I got for two dollars and a half; a small occasional table for one dollar; an engraving of Sir Walter Scott in his study, charmingly framed, for a dollar and twenty-five cents, and one of Mary Stuart for six-fifty. My andirons I bought for six dollars in an antique shop in Toronto, and my heart was gladdened this summer by the gift of an old fire-screen beautifully worked on moire silk by my friend's grandmother. It is handsomely framed in walnut and on a pedestal of exquisite design.

While I am still on the hunt for more furniture—a sofa, chairs, tables, etc.—the house is now very habitable and cosy, and I am going to expend my energies on the grounds. These have wondrous possibilities.

I have already established beds of hardy perennials in front of the house. Hollyhocks, foxglove, larkspur, Canterbury bells, and other favorites keep a succession of bloom during my vacation. As I am unable to open the house until June and have to leave it in September, I cannot do much in the way of annuals.

I had the barn removed, as it blotted out one of my finest views. The place is a bird-paradise. Robins, cat-birds, wrens, wild canaries, vireos, song-sparrows and many of the other small fry have built in my trees and bushes. During the past summer I was greeted every morning by a stately crane—not a stork, for as I have already said, I am a respectable bachelor—which paraded in front of my dining-room windows in search of his breakfast in the mill-race. Musk rats swim along the banks, and the deep cry of the bittern can be heard towards evening as he forages for his supper. Kingfishers shriek as they plunge after minnows, and phlegmatic turtles float languidly past my dwelling. We hailed one of the latter as he drifted by and he made excellent soup.

HERE with my friends and relatives we fleet the time carelessly for three blissful months. I have no servants at Glen Lodge, for life is simply camping out under a roof. We eat when we please, and do not have to consider daylight-saving or any other invention of fantastic minds. We are three miles from the nearest station and six from the nearest town. My house is, however, within three minutes' walk of the village store where all the essentials may be purchased. A little Menonite woman supplies me with cream and most delicious butter, so house-keeping cares are reduced to a minimum. As in all country places the meat question is the most serious, but a fisherman comes once a week with excellent fish fresh from the Great Lakes.

I have said nothing about my kitchen, which is a large one and in which my house-parties turn loose their talents and energy. I cook on an oil-heater, which gives wonderful satisfaction. My kettle boils as cheerily and with as much gusto as that in the most up-to-date establishment presided over by a Chinese chef. The cellar is of good size, brick-paved, and so cool that I never have to buy ice.

This is a meagre account of a little home (minus a presiding goddess, to be sure) created with a moderate amount of ingenuity and on an income that would perhaps astonish you were I to tell you how really small it is. But I have a good time myself and incidentally manage to give some fun to my friends who always enjoy the country with its freedom from restraint and convention. My story may impel some other man similarly situated to go and do likewise, and judging from my own experience, I do not think he will ever regret it. Try and see!

"Best by Every Test"

THE constant effort of manufacturers to improve their products and reach the highest point of perfection entitles them to your consideration, and while, for selfish motives there may be forces working to belittle such commendable efforts, the ultimate results are sooner or later bound to be recognized and appreciated by the thoughtful and intelligent individual. The success of any of the well-known articles that have come to be looked upon as the standard articles of their kind, is invariably followed by the attempt of envious imitators to benefit by another's success, basing their claims for recognition on the unsubstantial statement of "just as good." Such claim is of itself a recognition of superiority of the article imitated.

Gillett's Goods have reached the point of perfection that places them in a class by themselves, and while often imitated, are never equalled.

All dealers are authorized to guarantee Gillett's Goods as being the best and purest that it is possible to produce, and to be just as represented.

IF the future of a people is mainly the business and responsibility of its mothers, that of Canada should be one of the brightest. Canada has many products and many resources, but not one of which she can be so justly proud, as of her young womanhood. In physique, comeliness, capacity, character and intelligence the Canadian girl is a splendid evolution of type. Some fruits ripen to greatest perfection in the North. The flavor is improved by conditions not too easy and favorable. Perhaps our Canadian girl has profited by the same experience. Certainly for several generations her life was far from one of luxury. Canada was long poor. For many a decade after wealth and comfort had become a common portion on the other side of the line, Canadian social conditions remained small and narrow.

The daughters of the land, both in town and country, lived very different lives from those of their descendants of to-day. Bath-rooms and furnaces were amenities of hotels, or of the few rich dwellers in cities. You performed your ablutions in your bedroom, whatever their extent, and were not seldom confronted on a winter morning with a water-jug frozen solid. The upper part of the house might be warmed by a "drum" from a stove below. Stove pipes, from the same source, were also thought to have a moderating influence. They did sometimes feel warm to the touch. Sanitary arrangements were in the back yard, pumps in the kitchen with cisterns, inviting typhoid fever, often successfully. Perhaps more servants were available than there are to-day, but there was no money to pay them. I remember when six dollars a month was thought high wages. The laundry had not arrived—all washing was done at home, even the lace curtains, pinned on stretchers to dry, a spring proceeding of great importance and anxiety. Preserves were naturally put up in the kitchen, and the self-sealer was unknown; you covered your garry-pot with paper. The grocer had no tempting rows of bottled fruit, fair and round and whole, to tempt you from your cooking stove withal. Your stove, that stood well out in the middle of the kitchen, with a lofty stove-pipe elbow, and a movable boiler for washing days—and burned wood. "Cord-wood" that was stacked green in the back yard, to be split up as required. And the ashes went into the vat for some mysterious purpose connected with the yearly making of soft soap for the scrubbing of floors and tables—a generous provision in a barrel, out of which you dipped with a saucer, holding your nose.

NO, those were not luxurious days. Socially, too, they were barren times compared with these. Most small towns had their whist club, but it was apt to consist of seniors, not necessarily grave and reverend, but very different from the bridge fours of to-day. Dances were few and far between, and a far larger proportion of the community disapproved of them than take that view now-a-days. The theatre hardly existed outside the larger cities and precariously there. No automobiles and no cinemas, few journeys and short ones, plain fare and a new "best" dress and hat twice a year—the grandmothers of our girls might find some difficulty in explaining how they managed to enjoy life at all in the conditions of their youth.

Of course they did enjoy it, and the church social and the bob-sleigh party and the spelling-bee were just as exciting in their time as the more sophisticated entertainments. The point is that out of her long deprivation, the Canadian girl has probably emerged, on the one hand, more keen and eager for the more modern banquet of life, and on the other, more modest and disciplined in the enjoyment of it. That is how her attitude and the explanation of it occurs to one at least of her admirers.

Canadian girls have never lacked the cherishing and protecting which is the lot of women in new countries, but they do not seem to have taken advantage of it to the extent one notices among their American sisters. I find them more the comrades of their men folk, and less inclined to occupy the pedestal so widely tenanted by the ladies of the neighboring Republic. Perhaps the Canadian's sense of humour keeps her off it, perhaps her unselfishness, perhaps just her com-motto is "Make the best of it." She is candid, frank and sincere, notably free of affectation. Her manners have less finish than those of English girls, but you feel that her deference comes from the heart, her kindness is charming and her enthusiasm delightful. The war brought her less into public life and left her less restless than girls in England, but she took it in her stride, so to speak, and the men who won it know that she did her part. Perhaps her most marked characteristic is her resourcefulness, her independence of circumstances. Left penniless, she takes to the nearest job as naturally as the English-woman takes to the nearest relation.

Girls in Canada are still wholesomely and happily girls—satisfied with the lot that is theirs—and indeed it is enviable enough—just living as girls live, waiting for the hour and the mate. As young married women wider interests claim them—social, political, imperial. No feature of modern life in this country is more interesting or more significant than the almost universal formation of Women's Canadian Clubs. They stand for the breaking down of the old narrow domestic limitations and the fresh values in women's lives produced by their participation in the wider movements of the life about them. The modern Canadian woman is being more and more of a politician, an economist, a sociologist. More and more the great griefs of humanity are touching them to response. They are bringing their hands and their influence to the righting of wrongs, the helping of the weak, the fairer distribution of the burdens of the world, as these things are open to them. There is a wonderful difference in their talk, their interests, their reading, in the last couple of decades.

THE question as to the typical Canadian woman is sometimes raised, and the discussion thereon invariably leads to perplexity. For, in the ancient province of Quebec, there are hundreds of thousands of French-Canadian maids and matrons who might be sisters to Evangeline in their demureness and devotion. Their early marriages and consequent absorption in family cares at an age when most Ontario girls are still at college, gives a distinctively old-world touch to the rural homes of Quebec, which might yet be called Old France. The vivacity and courtesy of the French element gives a piquant aspect to the feminine population of the Dominion, which is appreciated by the observing visitor. It may be noted, too, that from Quebec have come the Canadian singers who have won international fame in the cities of Europe.

A sympathetic observer of Canadian communities, who has recently made the tour of the nine provinces has declared that he noticed in Canadian women, whether in the Island of Cape Breton or Vancouver, kindness and resourcefulness.

Of course the Canadian girl has the defects of her qualities. Her sturdy independence and straightforwardness leave sometimes a little lack of dignity and grace. Her very attractive diffidence is a little apologetic and self-conscious, and her intense patriotism hardly concedes enough to the standards of older civilizations. In spite of her splendid athletics, she does not always stand or sit or walk well. She has not yet had time to think of these things. Meanwhile she drives an even more expensive car, seeks like the honey bee, further and further afield for sources of culture and of charm, finds ever wider walks of influence and occupation—and remains, with every opportunity of being spoiled, a perfect and unquenchable Dear.

THEIR NAME LIVETH FOREVERMORE

mon sense. At all events, she is far less exacting and more disposed to share her husband's burdens than to ignore them. In this respect, she occupies a just and admirable mean between the indulged and petted American, and the English-woman who is too apt to do the indulging and petting herself. Canadian husbands are neither slaves nor tyrants, and these exemptions do not come by nature or by grace, but simply by the character and disposition of the women of the nation.

THE Canadian girl is essentially healthy-minded. I doubt if the morbid modern idea of sex war would find so much as patient discussion, much less toleration or approval, in any representative gathering from Halifax to Vancouver. Her views of life are sane and straight, and her

The Possibilities in every Woman's Face

THE soft, appealing charm of a fresh, lovely skin—of course, you want it. Every girl does. Every girl wants to be attractive, lovable, admired.

And unless your skin is right, nothing is right. Haven't you often felt that? What use to wear the prettiest frock if your skin is pale and lifeless, marred by blackheads or ugly little blemishes?

You can make your skin so noticeably soft, so exquisitely fresh and clear that at first glance it will awaken admiration and delight. By studying it—learning its possibilities—then giving it every day the kind of care that suits its particular needs, you, too, can win the charm of "a skin you love to touch."

Examine your skin closely in a strong light before a hand mirror. Does it look dull and sallow? Does it lack the soft, lovely color you admire in other girls?

Don't let a condition like this, which you can easily overcome, destroy your skin's possibilities of loveliness and charm.

If your skin is pale, sallow, lifeless, it is not in a normal condition. The little blood vessels are inactive, and should be stimulated. The delicate pores need to be thoroughly cleansed and invigorated.

How to give your skin new life and color

You can rouse your skin to color and life by giving it this special steam treatment:

One or two nights a week fill your wash bowl full of hot water—almost boiling hot. Bend over the top of the bowl and cover your head and the basin with a heavy bath towel, so that no steam can escape. Steam your face for thirty seconds.

Now lather a hot cloth with Woodbury's Facial Soap, and with this wash your face thoroughly, rubbing the lather well into your skin with an upward and outward motion.

Then rinse your face well, first with warm water, then with cold, and finish by rubbing it for thirty seconds with a piece of ice. Dry carefully.

The other nights of the week wash your face thoroughly in the Woodbury way, with Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water, ending with a dash of cold water.

You can feel how much good this treatment is doing your skin

The very first time you use this new steam treatment you will notice that it leaves your face with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. This only means that your skin is responding to a more thorough and stimulating kind of cleansing than it has been accustomed to. After a few treatments, this drawn feeling will disappear, and your skin will emerge so soft, so glowing with life and color, that you will realize how much good this treatment is doing you.

Repeat the treatment once or twice a week until your skin has recovered the soft, clear color and radiance it should have. Then continue to use Woodbury's Facial Soap in your daily toilet, in order to keep your skin in an active, healthy condition.

This is only one of the famous Woodbury treatments for the care of the skin. You will find special treatments for each different skin condition in the little booklet that is wrapped around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Get a cake to-day—begin, to-night, the treatment your skin needs. Woodbury's Facial Soap is on sale at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, or for general cleansing use.

"Your Treatment for One Week"

A beautiful little set of the Woodbury's skin preparations sent to you for 25 cents.

Send 25 cents for this dainty miniature set of Woodbury's skin preparations, containing your complete Woodbury treatment for one week.

You will find, first the little booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," telling you the special treatment your skin needs; then a trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap—enough for seven nights of any treatment; a sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream; and samples of Woodbury's Cold Cream and Facial Powder, with directions telling you just how they should be used. Write to-day for this special new Woodbury outfit. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 5207 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

CHAPTER ONE.

"WHILE THE BANNOCK BAKES."

"JACK of all Trades and Master of Many." So Frank Hayes had described himself in the Dominion Government schedule sent out to gather data for a Blue Book, to be duly published by a methodical Government when the information was comfortably out of date. A dreary red-taped clerk at Ottawa had frowned at the flippancy, and entered Hayes in the "Homesteader" column—which, after all, was very much the same thing.

Just now Hayes was a solo cook. Ten minutes ago he had been a stableman, after a short spell as a woodsman. Earlier in the day he had been a teamster, a road builder, a bridge constructor, a saddler, a veterinary surgeon, a prospector, and an orator, working up to a brilliant climax when his team hesitated in climbing the steep grades that led to the Fir Ridge.

Though there had been a saddle-horse trail over the mountain for some years, Hayes was the first man to bring a wagon to the Fir Ridge. It was not a great journey in actual distance—barely twelve miles. On a good road an automobile would make it in twelve minutes; but Hayes had been nearly twelve hours fighting his way up the steep hills with his team.

At last, with the early spring day nearly spent, Hayes reached the Fir Ridge, tired, but triumphant. For it is no small matter to be the first man to break a road in a new country; it is a feat to be remembered for a generation.

Well pleased with his exploit, Hayes squatted in front of his camp fire, baking a bannock for his evening meal. As he watched the dancing flames, he idly marvelled that he, of all men, should know how to swing an axe or handle a team, or build a fire by which a bannock might be cooked—the acid test of efficiency in the catechism of things the pioneer must know.

Hayes was not of those designed by nature to be avant-coureurs of civilization. Fair of hair and blue of eye, tall and slim, with a mobility of feature that denoted a nervous temperament, in spite of his rough clothes and primeval surroundings, he still retained much of the indelible stamp of the city man. Years of exposure to biting cold and blinding heat had deeply tanned a once-clear skin, but through it all Hayes somehow suggested an ascetic wanderer engaged in menial penance.

It was not always so! Time was when those calloused fingers—not calloused then—had toyed with an instrument infinitely more potent than axe or mattock.

A curious smile spread over the features of the frontiersman as he watched the bannock slowly browning in the frying pan. Only a hungry, healthy man can truly appreciate a bannock, and Hayes could not but be amused as he contrasted this rude meal with tempting repasts which had been spread before him in the past, many of which he had pushed away untasted.

When, eight years earlier, Hayes had drifted into this remote part of the Quesnel Lake district, in the northern interior of British Columbia, his coming had not been entirely a matter of choice. He had travelled up the historic Cariboo road from Ashcroft to Soda Creek as swamper to an Ashcroft teamster, to whom he had been worse than useless, though with the redeeming possession of an alcoholic thirst which it took two to assuage, all at Hayes' expense.

At Soda Creek, Hayes had exchanged his remaining capital for more liquor and poker chips, and played against professional tinhorns. For two days and two nights he had been "a dead game sport," then by a natural transition he had become a "dead beat." Thereafter he lived as do most dipsomaniacs who are penniless in a strange place, on the generosity of men in a hurry to have what they call "a good time before beating it back to the jungles."

One night Hayes crawled under a canvas stretched over a settler's wagon load of supplies. When he awoke next morning Soda Creek was miles away. He felt stiff and cold. Sharp corners of boxes were bruising him as the wagon lumbered along over a decidedly rough road. He had slept until then, he learned later, because this was the first bad stretch on the Quesnel Lake road.

Hayes squirmed and wriggled his way out from under the canvas, finally emerging under the driver's seat. To Hayes' amazement the driver did not seem at all concerned over the commotion the stowaway was causing, apparently devoting all his attention to guiding his team.

Strong in the consciousness of the absence of any ulterior motive, Hayes apologized for his presence under the canvas, and was proceeding to go into details when the rancher interrupted with:

"That's all right. Take a seat here. You can tell me if you like, but I ain't curious by nature."

"Curiosity in this case would certainly be legitimate," laughed Hayes. "You don't usually find a stranger sleeping among your supplies, I take it?"

"I've got a pretty good team here," remarked the other man, flicking the off horse with the lines.

Hayes knew nothing about horses, nor could he see any relation between question and answer until the rancher added:

"... a pretty good team, but if I'd been heavily loaded I'd have thrown you out of the wagon before leaving Soda Creek."

"Of course," said Hayes, with a slightly cynical smile. "I believe I've heard of you. You're James J. Jeffries, are you not?"

"No," came the reply, so simply that Hayes could not believe the shot had gone over his companion's head. "That's not my name—I'm Cory Harrigan."

The stowaway looked at him curiously. He had heard of Cory Harrigan during his trip up the Cariboo road with the freighter, and so knew him to be quite a character even in that country where there are so many queer types. Hayes had not believed many of the tales told him of Harrigan, but now that he was face to face with the man they did not seem to be so very improbable after all.

Harrigan asked no questions, not even his companion's name or intentions. His team could pull the load—what else mattered?

At noon Harrigan told Hayes to build a fire while he attended to the horses. Hayes was still vainly trying to get a blaze started when the rancher, his horses unhitched and fed, took over the job in a most matter-of-fact way. When Hayes, in answer to the question "Can you cook?" answered "I don't know, I never tried," Harrigan quite cheerfully said "Then you can't!" and took over that task also.

At the evening halt, when the team was being unharnessed and turned out to graze, Hayes succeeded in building a fire without too much difficulty. He also did his best in the cooking line, which was bad enough, Harrigan said. After supper the two men smoked and talked for an hour or so before rolling in the blankets under the wagon for the night.

Though Harrigan had not directly volunteered any information concerning himself, he had answered all Hayes' questions readily enough. In fact, Hayes later decided that he had used a lot of unnecessary finesse in ascertaining that Harrigan lived alone, had about three hundred head of

The stowaway looked at him curiously. a tramp, and booked Harrigan as a "loose, idle and disorderly person, having no visible means of subsistence, and failing to give a good account of himself."

worn it to go fishing; to Cory it was just getting comfortable. By the end of the third year a railway construction Bohunk would have passed it

Hayes had put in his improvements on his first homesteads by fencing, plowing, building a barn and corrals, and two small shacks in which he had technically lived for six months of each year while performing his duties. In point of fact Hayes had not slept half a dozen nights on his homesteads in the six years, but the fiction of actual residence had to be established before he could secure a crown grant, hence the building of two unnecessary shacks.

On his new place, Hayes had built a more substantial house, and it was to get "shakes" for the roof that he had made the arduous journey to the Fir Ridge. On the morrow he would cut down a straight-grained tree, saw it up into suitable lengths, and split it into shakes.

When a man builds for himself a substantial house, it is fairly conclusive evidence that he has decided to be a permanent resident of that district. Hayes moralized on this as he broke his bannock in the cheery glow of the camp fire on the lonely mountain ridge where he had come for material for his roof. He had the true Briton's passion for a home and, in Cory Harrigan's opinion, had been unnecessarily elaborate in the building of his new place. Hayes smiled as he recalled this, his pardonable pride in the house, and some of his youthful ideas of what his particular castle should be like.

"Eight years here is a long, long time," he murmured, as he finished his simple supper and prepared to enjoy a post-prandial smoke. His cigarette papers and matches were in his shirt pocket, his plug of tobacco was—home, twelve miles away. He faced the unpleasantness of two or three days without tobacco.

But not without a smoke! Master of many trades, he was equal to the emergency. Kanick-kanick berries reddened the earth all around, fir trees were bearded with moss, and timothy hay littered the bottom of the wagon box. A few kanick-kanick leaves, a very little moss, and enough timothy seeds to give the necessary bite, and Hayes had a tobacco substitute which was, he assured himself, fully equal to the best imported mixtures, only of course not so widely advertised.

CHAPTER TWO.

CORY HARRIGAN AND HIS PANTS.

THE most curious trait about Cory Harrigan was his utter lack of curiosity. Changes he abhorred, and avoided whenever possible. Without being knowingly discourteous, other people's opinions and feelings weighed not the slightest against his own inclinations. Cory lived up to his perversion of the Golden Rule: "Do Unto Yourself as You Would Others Did Unto You."

This possibly explains why, at thirty-two, Cory had $1,000.00 in the bank, 400 head of cattle, 26 horses, and all the machinery that goes to make up a Western stock ranch. All of these Cory had amassed by his thrift, industry and dogged determination since he was twenty-one, when all he had in the world was a virgin homestead and a legacy of ten thousand dollars.

In matters beyond the limits of his ranch and range, Harrigan never showed the slightest interest. He had not read a newspaper for years, and for all he knew or cared Sir Wilfrid Laurier might still be Premier of Canada. Political changes meant no more to him than does an election promise to the unsuccessful candidate the day after the votes are counted.

As to Cory's physical appearance, there can be no better guide than this extract from the Ashcroft police blotter, where a circus policeman once decided that no tramp could look so much like ago." And he wore the same clothes, or rather his clothes still looked the same.

For Cory Harrigan's clothes did not wear out in the ordinary sense of the word. They eroded. No cloth has yet been manufactured that will forever stand the hard work of a rancher's day. In time it will rip, tear and ravel. But good cloth will not rot in a lifetime, if worn continuously.

Once upon a time Cory had bought a brand new suit of working clothes. He had selected it with care, testing every seam, gouging every button-hole with his jack-knife, and tugging at every button with his teeth. He had stood with both feet on one leg of the pants, thrown the other over his shoulder and tugged with all his might to make sure they would not split at the crotch. He had put the coat sleeves to the same test. He had taken the waistcoat to a water tap and turned a stream on it to assure himself the cloth was water-resisting. And then, satisfied, he had paid the trembling storekeeper forty dollars, retired to the rear of the store and encased himself in his new cocoon.

That was many years ago, but Cory still wore what was left of that suit. Within a year it had reached the stage at which a city man would have discarded it; to Cory it had hardly been worn. Inside two years a very poor man might have

Morning in the North-West

By Arthur Stringer

Grey countries and grim empires pass away,
And all the pomp and glory of citted towers
Goes down to dust, as Youth itself shall age.
But O the splendour of this autumn dawn—
This passes not away! This dew-drenched Range,
This infinite great width of open space,
This cool, keen wind that blows like God's own breath
On life's once drowsy coal, and thrills the blood,
This brooding sea of sun-washed solitude,
This virginal vast dome of opal air—
These, these endure, and greater are than grief!
Still there is strength: and life, oh, life is good!
Still the horizon lures, the morrow calls,
Still hearts adventurous seek outward trails,
Still life holds up its tattered hope!

For here

Is goodly air, and God's own greenness spread.
Here youth audacious fronts the coming day
And age on life ne'er mountainously lies.
Here are no huddled cities old in sin,
Where coil in tangled languors all the pale Envenomed mirths that poisoned men of old,
Where peering out with ever-narrowing eyes
Reptilious Ease unwinds its golden scales
And slimes with ugliness the thing it eats.
Here life takes on a glory and a strength
Of things still primal, and goes plunging on.
And what care I of time-encrusted tombs,
What care I here for all the ceaseless drip
Of tears in countries old in tragedy?
What care I here for all Earth's creeds outworn.
The dreams outlived, the hopes to ashes turned,
In that old East so dark with rain and doubt?
Here life swings glad and free and rude, and I Shall drink it to the full, and go content!

not noid stitches, Cory doggedly squeezed another two months' wear by driving holes all around the sole and lacing it over the vamp with baling wire.

Cory's hat had once been a soft black felt, but countless showers and bleachings had faded the black to a dull grey-green, though the original color still showed faintly where the ribbon had clung over the brim for many seasons. The crown had been cut and slashed one day in the hayfield because Cory felt oppressively hot. As this drastic proceeding not only spoiled the shape of the hat but would tend to shorten its usefulness, Cory had bunched the ends together and tied them with twine.

It must not be supposed that Harrigan was miserly, parsimonious, or even close. When he bought, the best was barely good enough. He lived well, so far as his limitations permitted. It was the idea of change that was foreign to his nature; he preferred to make things do until the things demonstrated their material nature by passing away.

Cory sought permanence in all things, and probably came as near finding it as any active man living. Every time some change was forced into his surroundings, Cory felt sad. And just now he was brooding over a great impending change. Frank Hayes, his hired man and companion for eight years, was about to leave him, and he would be alone, as he had been during the first few years of his homesteading.

Harrigan had brooded over his coming loneliness for several days before the Great Idea struck him.

"Like this," he said to Hayes as they lay in bed that evening. "I've been thinking hard about it, and all of a sudden, out of nowhere, I got the scheme. When you go away, I'm going to get married."

Hayes sat up in bed, fumbled for the matches and struck a light. He looked steadily at Harrigan's unblinking face. Then, without a word, he got out of bed and returned with a bottle of brandy.

"Here, drink this," he said, "it's good for fever, delirium tremens, brainstorm, softening of the brain, madness, senile decay, or whatever ails you. Take a long pull at it and go to sleep. You'll be all right to-morrow."

Cory pushed back the bottle. "I'm not sick," he said. "And I'm going to get married as soon as you go."

"Hear him rave! You marry! Man, you're crazy to think of it. Why, what girl do you suppose would have you?"

"The question is," corrected Cory, "what girl will I have? I've never seen any girl good enough for me to marry, but I suppose there's one somewhere that would suit. How long will it take you to find her?"

"Me!" fairly shouted Hayes.

"Certainly, you. You know just what kind of a woman I need here. If she isn't the right kind I'll drive her back to Soda Creek inside a week and get another."

"Oh, cut out that talk about marriage. Cory. You're not meant for double harness. Get a Chinaman, if you want a cook as well as a hired man."

"No. They tell me a Chink always goes back to China every ten years, and I'd never have the same one for any length of time. A wife'd have to stay till I die."

"Unless, of course, she dies first," said Hayes.

"That would be a nuisance," grumbled Cory.

"Believe me, she'd die first, and quick," snapped Hayes. "A woman wouldn't last six months in this junk shop of yours. Don't think because we endure pigging it in here that a woman could stand it, even if you could induce one to come into this jungle. In a week she'd be as crazy as you are this minute. Forget it, Cory, forget it."

A Story Proving that the Female of the Species is More Subtle Than the Male

A BIT OF MANAGING

By EVAH MCKOWAN

ILLUSTRATED BY MARION LONG

THE smartly tailored young woman who drew up her small runabout under the chestnuts that bordered the sidewalk in front of the home and office of Doctor Moore, was a stranger to the housewives of Merlinville, who watched from behind their geraniums. Odder still, she was a stranger to Anne Munroe, the maid of long standing who answered the newcomer's resolute ring of the office door bell.

"Doctor Moore is out of town,"—Anne knew that people always asked for Doctor Moore first; "but you might see Doctor Dehart."

"It is Doctor Dehart that I wish to see," the caller said. Whereupon, she was ushered into the bright waiting room.

"It will probably be some minutes. It really isn't office hours yet," Anne told her, the while she appraisingly sized up the caller to see whether she was of the conversational type. Many a bit of news had Anne picked up from the waiting patrons in the doctor's offices as she plied a duster, that was always ready, on furniture that was always dusted.

But as the stranger had merely nodded in answer to her remark and had at once busied herself with entries in a notebook, Anne replaced the duster and withdrew to duties in her rear.

The wait of several minutes did not surprise the visitor who felt sure that, just as she had driven up, she had caught a glimpse of the object of her quest, encased in teddy overalls and deep in the intricacies of the engine of a car that stood in the side yard of Doctor Moore's home.

But he stood at last in the doorway, very spick and span and carrying a breath of recent antiseptics. There was a gleam of satisfaction in the caller's eyes as she noticed that he was an extraordinarily presentable young man.

Very professionally and without an answering gleam of admiration—although such might easily have been justified—he ushered her into his office. She sat before him very straight-backed and resolute.

"Anything said will be treated confidentially, of course," she began.

"Of course."

"Then, I have come to see if you will make three calls in Brentwood."

"Er—well—"

"And, as I want this to be a strictly business transaction, I am making the rather odd request that you allow me to pay you in advance. Will you tell me what the fee will be?"

"Brentwood is Drayton's territory. We've never gone there."

"I know. I am Doctor Drayton's daughter; so that objection is removed. I might add that with the munition plants running full blast and the new hospital almost ready to open, Dad's practice has increased so that he is looking for a partner. It is an excellent opening. I understand that Doctor Moore has not taken you in here. Dad is particular, but it wouldn't do you any harm to have done his daughter a favor."

She watched narrowly to see if this bait was seasonable but, while she felt sure that there was a gleam of amusement in his eyes, his expression remained inscrutable.

"You are a truly remarkable young person," he said at last. "I gather that what I can do for you is to be a combination of professional call, business transaction and personal favor."

"Yes, practically. Will you tell me what three calls in Brentwood, spaced about a week apart, will cost me? As I said, I want to be strictly businesslike and pay in advance."

"Is that being businesslike?"

"Will you not answer my question?"

"But how can I? It might depend on the nature of the calls."

"Say an average call—to last three or four hours."

"H'm. Brentwood is—"

"Twenty-five miles. I did it in thirty-nine minutes."

"We—ell. Possibly ten to fifteen dollars."

"Forty-five dollars," she said, counting out the bills and laying them on a corner of his desk. He did not glance at them but waited for her to speak.

"And this is the situation," she began, trying with rather poor success to keep her color from rising: "In Brentwood there is a young man,—a very estimable and charming young man, but one who has been taking too much for granted. I've known him always as he is the son of my father's oldest friend. Neither his parents nor mine have made any secret of the fact that it is their dearest wish—and all that sort of thing. As a boy this young man was very jealous of my other playmates, always demanding that I give him my whole time and since coming home from college he has simply appropriated my society, taking for granted a right that he has not thought it worth his while to ask for.

"You can see what a position I am in. Of course, I can and do refuse to go with him sometimes, but it simply means that I stay at home instead. No one else asks me to go places. At the same time he is free to take some one else whenever he wishes. He has done so on a few occasions when interesting strangers turned up, with the result that, as you can imagine, I was very generally pitied by everyone. So you can see—"

"I see. He needs a bit of disciplining."

"That was my idea, or—well, not mine exactly, although the method is absolutely original. But I live in a home with a mother, a widowed aunt and a grandmother, all of whom wonder—audibly and otherwise—why Ronald has not come to the point. I don't know whether you can imagine my feelings—"

He gave a nod of sympathetic encouragement.

"Aunt Bess," she went on, "has received scores of proposals in her day; does so occasionally yet. She asks me what I can expect when I have no more tact than to beat Ron at tennis. And Gran says that men find nothing alluring about girls who are too independent and straightforward; that in her day girls used their eyes more and tongues less.

"But the climax came when my poor dear mother sighed and said that Ronald was as devoted as any girl could wish, and that all he requires is a little managing. So that is what I am up to—a bit of managing."

"You—er—care for the young man?" Then; "Of course. I beg your pardon. You are not after his money."

"How do you know that he has money?"

"Everyone knows that Ronald Braithwaite has more than he knows what to do with."

"Yes," she sighed, "he has. I wish he hadn't. Not only do I get sick of hearing my family singing his eligibility but, if he were poor, other people would mind their own business better."

"And—pardon this—are you sure that he cares for you?"

Miss Drayton began a blush that ended in a dimple.

"I am betting forty-five dollars on it," she laughed. "At any rate, I think the treatment will either kill or cure."

"H'm. What do you want me to do?"

"Just come to call on me. I have discovered that Ron has still his old-time streak of jealousy, although almost rusted from long disuse. Of course, I've no chance to try this plan with home talent. He has all the Brentwood boys buffaloed. Not a soul comes near me except Ronald Braithwaite—when he chooses. So you see—"

"I see. And I think that the idea does you credit. When shall the treatment begin?"

"Could you come Monday evening—or, no; come Sunday evening for dinner. You've got to eat somewhere, so it won't waste so much of your time. I'll fix it with mother."

"Then, they are opening the new Aeolian Hall with a The Dansant on Monday week; you might take me to that. Thirdly, you might take me for a drive on the following Sunday afternoon. We could go to the fish-hatcheries out by Fenelon Falls. Everyone goes there."

She did not add: "Everyone in love. The sensible people prefer the lake road."

"But," he said incredulously, "Are you actually asking me to take money for a programme like that? Or what can you be thinking?"

"Oh, well, then," she said with a sigh of finality as she reached for the money. "I had hoped that you would be sensible. Otherwise, the deal is most certainly off. I came to you because I knew of no one else who could put a value on a call and so make it a matter of business. Also, of course, doctors get into the way of keeping secrets. I'm sorry" she finished, rising.

"Hold on," he begged. "Sure I'll come. But—why not pay for just the first now. Perhaps the others will not be necessary. And ten dollars is plenty—far too much."

"Very well," she said after some thought. "I'll pay for the first now and let you know about the others during next week. And, needless to say, if my family suspect this I will be slain bodily,—although few actions of mine would surprise them."

"No one shall hear of it from me," he said, escorting her to the door "And good luck to the venture."

At just fifteen minutes to five on the following Sunday afternoon, a smart roadster rolled into Brentwood and swung to the gate of Doctor Drayton's comfortable home.

The occupant of this, when he mounted the broad steps of the Drayton porch, was observed to carry something seldom seen in the economical precincts of Brentwood—a bunch of hot-house roses gleaming frostily pink through their waxed paper wrapping.

Elaine Drayton met him at the door with a smile of almost boyish camaraderie.

"Couldn't have been better," she told him. "You met him at the corner."

"The tall, intellectual looking chap with glasses?"

"Yes, that is Ronald Braithwaite. How lovely the roses are! That is a touch that I would not have thought of."

"The roses are for your mother. I don't like the deal she is getting out of this," he said, shaking himself out of his tweed coat.

"Mother? Oh, she's always delighted to have a stranger come. I told her that I had met you in Merlinville and that you were ignorant of the beauties of Brentwood and all that. She will be down in a minute. Come in and meet Grandmother."

Doctor Dehart sensed that the little grandmother who sat straight-backed by the living-room fire was the family autocrat. She trained a gold-mounted lorgnette on him and he was not sure but that there was suspicion in her glance.

He found the aunt to be a person of eyes and over-dressed hair, clothed in studied black and white. Elaine's mother he mentally characterized as a tramp; her boundless hospitality put him at his ease at once.

The old Doctor came in and added to her welcome his warm handshake. After which he sank on the davenport and drummed impatiently with his hands as he watched the clock. Plainly, he was a man who favored punctuality—in some one.

"Wasn't that the dinner gong, mother?" the daughter asked, making ready to rise.

"Ronald isn't coming?" challenged Mrs. Drayton, senior, bending her sharp glance full on her grand-daughter.

"I forgot to tell you mother. Ronald is not coming. It is too bad. Doctor Dehart wants to meet him."

She turned her eyes full on the visitor who caught his cue adroitly.

"I do indeed. I have often heard of him, and Miss Drayton talked of no one else."

Whereupon he rose with the others and, offering his arm to the grandmother, escorted her to the dining-room with all the gallantry of a Chesterfield. He seated her carefully and devoted himself to her indefatigably both during the meal and the remainder of the evening.

Her discovery that his father had once toured Japan with her late husband and that the young man liked the works of William Morris kept the two talking almost continually until the visitor rose and declared that he had had a singularly enjoyable evening.

Doctor Drayton's warm invitation to come again was seconded heartily by the pleased old lady.

"Is it a dress affair on Monday night?" he asked Elaine, in the hall.

"No, flannels. But I'll let you know during the week whether we are to go."

But I thought—

"I'd better try out this much first. That was your idea, you know."

"But surely so pleasant a thing as this can't end this way—I beg your pardon. I will remember my part of the bargain. Just let me know."

"Not a bad chap at all," her father said, when she returned to the living-room. "How did he manage to get an invitation out of you, Elaine? Has he got wind of the fact that I want a partner?"

"Goodness, Dad! You're not even sure yourself that you do."

Then, hiding her eyes from her grandmother, she added:

"I thought him rather dull."

"Dull, child," exclaimed that lady, tartly. "He is rarely interesting. You don't know how to talk to a man. Why, I can give you fifty years and beat you at your own game."

ON Thursday of the following week a note in the bold handwriting of Elaine Drayton put new life and zest into the person of one Doctor Dehart—new life and zest where, for the early part of the week there had been a dreary sense of deflation.

"Dear Rescuer," it read. "A second treatment seems to be necessary. At present I am being disciplined for the incident of Sunday night, and no invitation has been forthcoming for the dance, although I have been guilty of opportunities. But, for the first time in my life, I feel independent. You'll come?"

"Elaine."

The gleaming floor of the Aeolian Hall was well filled when Elaine Drayton and her escort entered on the night of the dance. Most of the flower-trimmed booths that bordered the hall were already occupied and, as they searched for a vacant table, a hush of curiosity fell on the room; the swish of Elaine's silken ruffles and the click of her French heels were the only sounds heard.

"Were you ever so rubbered at?" she asked, as the band relieved the tension by striking up a lively fox-trot. Then:

"Oh, I forgot. Gran says that men do not like slangy girls. Is that true? I've always wanted to ask someone."

"Why don't you ask Braithwaite?"

"Because I know he doesn't. I'm never slangy when he is around."

"I shouldn't wonder," he said severely, "if your grandmother is right."

Whereupon he proceeded to disprove his words by an attitude of devotion that could not possibly have been excelled by any of grandmother's beaux in the days when coquetry was in flower. He ate his ice cream without taking his eyes from her face. Three dances passed without their so much as glancing at the dancers.

"I'm wondering," Elaine mused, "Where you got your technique. Really, it's flawless!"

"Comes to me naturally, although I never was aware of it before. Shall we dance?"

They rose at the opening bars of a waltz and drifted away in perfect unison. Seemingly all ears for his partner's chatter, Doctor Dehart was doing some rapid thinking. He had caught a lonesome expression on the face of his patient, Ronald Braithwaite, notwithstanding the fact that that immaculate young man was accompanied by a very young and very dashing widow from a near-by city, and was also quite surrounded by a bevy of local silken butterflies in whom interest was rapidly reviving.

"Wouldn't the effect be rather—er—what we want, if we were to beat it after this dance?" he ventured.

And Elaine, who had caught a look of absolute rapacity in the eyes of some detached butterflies, and knew that they certainly intended to meet her partner by force or otherwise, as soon as the dance was finished, raised him to the seventh heaven by answering:

"Yes. Let's do."

They were beside the broad entrance when the last bars of the old Blue Danube died away. They seemed simply to drift out with the last sounds.

He ate his ice cream without taking his eyes from her face.

Elaine still carried her scarf about her shoulders. He adjusted it to meet the cool of the late May evening.

"My hat is still inside," he said with satisfaction. "Some one is sure to note that I forgot it. It should make quite an impression. There really is quite a lot of business in acting when one gets going."

They turned at the top of the street and, through the brightly lighted windows, watched the crowd revolving in a circle two-step.

"I had counted on this dance for two months," Elaine laughed, as they resumed their way.

"The best laid schemes of mice and men," he quoted. "But do I have to go home now?"

"No. We'll go back and talk to Gran. She will think that you would rather do that than dance, although we had better not be there in less than an hour. She is of a suspecting nature; it was bad enough explaining why Ron was not taking me."

So they strolled home the long way round; over the stone bridge on the Brent Pike; through the miniature park, where the air was adream with the odour of lilacs and the stars a silver galaxy overhead.

It was a silent walk. The girl was busy with thoughts of her own which her companion respected. On his part, he seemed unable to open any subject that did not lead into paths forbidden by their present situation.

His parrying of the home questions when at last they arrived, was nothing short of marvelous.

"What a lawyer he would be!" Elaine thought.

The compliments he paid to the charming young women of Brentwood—Elaine wondered when he had taken the time to look at them—so disarmed and charmed Mrs. Drayton, senior, that she opened one of her cherished bottles of blackberry wine to grace the occasion. This, the visitor praised to the right degree of nicety.

Was it the hand of a capricious fate that Ronald Braithwaite had never cared for blackberry wine?

Later, Elaine stood with him on the porch steps. "What a gorgeous night," she exclaimed. "Let us hope that we will have as nice a Sunday."

Then, at his continued silence:

"You're coming Sunday, aren't you?"

It was some moments before he answered. She noticed by the light that shone through the living room window that his face was not so boyish as she had thought it.

"Do you think I'd better?" he asked

"Well," she said, misreading his meaning, "It seems so. Anyhow, you will not regret it. Fenelon Falls is a charming spot. Shall we start at two?"

SUNDAY proved to be as sunny and smiling, as balmy and full of the songs of birds as any pair who ever travelled the fragrant, shaded road to Fenelon Falls could wish.

Once out of the village, Ellmore Dehart tossed his cap at his feet and abandoned himself to the joy of living. Whereupon his companion took off her hat and followed suit, the summer breezes tossing her chestnut hair at will.

It was said by one of the sensible ones who drove on the lake road that day that they had met every soul in Brentwood. Be that, as it may, Fenelon Falls was all but deserted. Any publicity the plotters had desired was doomed to disappointment.

But the spirit of youth is undaunted. Failing publicity to enjoy, they enjoyed the privacy. Together they roamed through the shaded park like two happy children: climbed to the top of the falls and walked along the flume that carried Brentwood's water supply; wandered by the miniature brooks where baby salmon and trout disported themselves in millions; crossed absurd little bridges or, failing these, used stepping stones in the brook where the water was shallow.

It was at one of these spots that Elaine slipped on a rounded stone and, before her companion could rescue her, had one dainty, white-shod foot in several inches of chilly water.

She found herself deposited on a bank of moss and violets, bounded on the west by the rippling brook that seemed to laugh at its merry prank, and on the north, east and south by alders and weeping willows. Here, Elaine was ordered to take off her shoe and dry her foot—ordered in a tone that she obeyed without question. Then, when the white buckskin Oxford hung in a sunny spot with a silken white stocking drying beside it—he had brusquely insisted on that too—he lay on the moss with his back turned so that when the unfortunate foot got tired of being sat on it might come out for a change without embarrassment.

"Look here," Elaine said, after a long silence. "If you can't be sensible for the next five minutes, I shall feel cheap for the rest of my life. You remember our bargain. And of course you understand that I cannot send a cheque as I

HELP WANTED—FEMALE

HAVE two novels ready to type. Want to marry stenographer who will live with me long enough to do the work. Apply by letter, stating qualifications and enclosing photograph. No references required. Photographs of unsuccessful applicants will be returned. Bartholomew Barrett, 419 10th St.

IN the morning "World" appeared the above ad. At five o'clock that evening Mr. Barrett suppressed a yawn, slammed his writing pad in a drawer, arose and entered his kitchen to light the gas range. He set the tea kettle on the flame, and stepped out on the porch to bring in his mail box. He had rigged up an empty box to serve in this capacity, for Bartholomew Barrett was a young writer upon whose work editors had not as yet concentrated sufficiently to discover merit. Mr. Barrett rolled the box within, and went back for the overflow, which the postman had carelessly heaped about the old porch rocker.

Then he went through the mass, tossing manuscripts into a corner. They need not concern him now, for the first of the month and his usual stipend were still a week distant; and there is no credit business at the stamp window. The rest of the mail he piled in the centre of the room for later attention, and returned to make his tea.

Having refreshed himself lightly with tea and lady-fingers, he seized a pair of scissors and began. The photographs he set up side by side in long rows along the book shelves which ran around the room, taking pains to lay each letter by the picture to which it pertained. When the space was all occupied he placed a row along the base-boards in the two bedrooms and the hall, and then was able to find room for the remainder on his big reading table.

Having thus disposed the lot so that all were accessible to his eye without touching them, he spent the rest of the evening looking them over, making little mental comparisons as he passed from one to the other. The homeliest one was at last found. "This one ought to stick," muttered Bartholomew. He now read her letter:

"... A pretty and refined young woman of twenty-three, unattached and heart-whole. If the novels are short, I might take on the job. Hoping for an interview, I am for the present,

"Sophia Bartle,

"28 B St.

"P.S.—My phone is 1012J."

Mr. Barrett rapidly replaced the photographs, each with its respective unread letter. "I'll let her return them."

He got Miss Bartle on the phone, and made an appointment for ten o'clock the next morning.

"I shall come, then, at ten," he said; "and, by the way, please let me have your full name and a few particulars that I must know in order to get the license."

"The license! Why—ah—you haven't seen me yet."

"I have seen your picture. It is sufficient. I chose you instantly out of some hundreds."

"But I—I haven't seen you yet."

"I am ninety-one, and ugly as a Beaver Indian. Money enough to live on by using great care. I'll bring the license with me to save time."

"Yes, I suppose you would hate to waste any at that age."

"HAVE you been married before? You see, I must know for the license clerk, otherwise it's immaterial."

"No, I haven't," she snapped, "and I don't think I will be now."

"Then, you're wasting my time; good-bye."

"Wait! You can get the license; but I don't promise for sure till I see you."

"That's fair enough. Ten o'clock sharp I'll be around to your place."

No. 28 B. Street proved to be one of those cheap boarding houses where toilers betake themselves out of the way of the rest of the world while recouping for another day of usefulness to other people. Sophia was waiting for him in the hall. He recognized her at once; but—well—there were some things the picture hadn't shown: the alert, trim, graceful little figure; the slim, muscular, well-turned ankles; the look of cleanness and confident capacity. Altogether it was a charming little person who met him in the hall. And this man of twenty-five, who was really sixteen and thought himself a hundred, felt a mischievous, sudden stirring amid his internal mechanism, whose serenity had already been disturbed by the poisonous coffee he had brewed that morning.

"Miss—Miss Bartle?" he stammered.

"You?" said Sophia, with lightening eyes.

"Ah, wait a moment, Miss Bartle, while I call a taxi. I—I have forgotten it. It's quite a distance around to my place."

While he was out Sophia took a careful look at herself in the hall mirror. A bit of colour had come to her face and a happy little glow of expectancy to her eyes.

"Maybe it's going to be all right. Oh, if it only could be!"

When he led her into the vine-covered old cottage and showed her the bright, big kitchen and and even jewelers. Bartholomew grew younger every day.

There was a little squabble about the cooking. Bartholomew had insisted upon doing it himself or having Mrs. Kelly brought in. He had maintained that Sophia's job was typing.

"But I am going to cook. After marrying a man of ninety-one just to get his support, do you think I'm going to let the old fool poison himself with his own cooking? And as for Mrs. Kelly, she doesn't set foot in this house again. It's a lovely old place, Bartholomew. Listen to the Burnet children playing out there in the backyard! They come through where the palings are loose, and hold high jinks. Their mother can't see them in our yard, and they love to play here. Yesterday little Teena had a nest made in the willow tree, and the boy was bringing her bugs to eat. They are stealing our cherries, too, I'm afraid."

"Let 'em steal," said Bartholomew. Then, shyly, "did they get away with all the cookies you baked yesterday?"

She flushed. "If you'd rather I wouldn't—" "I love you for it," he said. Then they both flushed. Bartholomew turned awkwardly away to his desk, and she commenced to pound the typewriter with a vigor which carried her far along that day into the first novel.

He laid a big, white, muscular hand on her little brown one.

the two dainty bedrooms, the long book-filled living-room, where a well-fed cat basked in the sun on a window seat, wide enough and long enough to hold six kiddies at once while they listened entranced to the tales a yarn-spinning mother could tell—then Sophia's eyes suddenly filled with tears and she flushed with shame.

"Ah! if it only could be," she thought; "but we went about it so awfully!"

"Would you prefer to have it here, or somewhere else?" asked Bartholomew, who was finding it constantly harder to be a hundred years old.

"Here, I think," faintly.

"I'll phone the minister and have Mrs. Kelly and her husband over for witnesses. Unless you have someone else you'd like to have come?"

"No, I have no one. I'd rather get it over with at once."

And so it was done, and the larder filled with good things, for grocers, happily for many, do a considerable credit business, as also do clothiers,

THE girl's efficiency about the housework was a continual marvel to Bartholomew. She slapped it through in no time, and went whistling about the kitchen concocting mysterious dishes, the like of which he had never known. The meal hour, which had been for him a thing of dread, often postponed, and always tolerated by necessity, was become a time of gladness, eagerly anticipated, and yielding joy in retrospection. When she bade him come to breakfast in dressing gown and slippers, as his mother used to permit, then was his cup of comfort full.

Bartholomew began to get fat, and he began to do much better work. He was still aged, however, and the graceful, alert little person who greeted him so eagerly in the morning and presided so charmingly at breakfast would droop a bit when he had gone in to his desk and gaze wistfully after his departing figure. But the wistfulness was always succeeded by a glint of determination and an angry little toss of the head.

Poor old Bartholomew didn't guess what a stout little halter was being woven for him. He was being made over by the lovely girlish presence in the house. If she didn't appear at her table by ten o'clock he was fidgety and couldn't work, and would come poking out into the kitchen on some pretext or other. But if he discovered her in her own room he would retreat hastily in confusion, and wait in disconsolate idleness till she appeared. If she left the house for more than ten minutes he was sure to be pacing the front porch when she returned.

The silly boob actually commenced to inflict his rejected manuscripts upon her for approval, and when she enthusiastically proclaimed his own secret conviction that they were gems of the literary art, it was but a lagging recollection of his own cold temper and the platonic nature of their association that kept him from clasping her to his bosom.

"But why don't they sell?" he asked.

"Why, that's plain as day. The foolish editors don't know good stuff when they read it, that's all."

At this additional confirmation of his own thought only the peal of the door-bell saved her from his ravishing arms.

Bartholomew was ashamed of himself. This would never do. Such impulses were disgraceful. If she should suspect that he felt that way, she would leave at once. He pulled himself together and went doggedly to work. It must have been that Sophia had suspected he felt that way, for

COUNTER ATTRACTIONS

By B1, No. 415.00

Five o'clock. — and your alarm clock reverberates through the sleepy halls. Without opening your eyes, you reach out an avenging arm and bestow upon the hapless time-piece a tweak which gives it the quietus, for the time being, at least.

You hear the girl in the next room stretching and yawning peevishly, and you know she must be getting up, but then, she always takes longer with her hair than you do. You make one feeble effort at waking, but, failing in it, you sink blissfully into a doze again. One by one, the girls along the hall plump out on to the floor; the girl next door has on her shoes now; you promise yourself that you also will plump out, but you allow yourself to close one eye for a moment, just to rest it a little. Below you, in the dining room, the maids are pegging around at an amazing clip, in their high-heeled shoes, laying breakfast. Girls, in dressing gowns are whisking past your door with soap and towels. They thump on your door and toss in a warning gibe as they pass. A door closes with a bang of finality, — an early bird gone down to breakfast. Yes, you certainly must get up at once. You turn over on your side; that will be a start, at least. A girl out in the hall is curling her hair at the gas-jet, a whiff of singeing hair floats in your door and wakens you again. The air is heavy with the perfume of talcum powder; the girl next door must have reached the final stages. Oh, well, you have all your clothes just where you can jump into them. It won't take you long.

Below stairs, chairs begin to scrape back; someone is through her breakfast. Somebody else will get your slice of bacon if you are not there to claim it. This disturbing thought brings you finally to your feet, and lends speed to the dressing process. You take a flying wash, whisk into your clothes, dexterously puff your hair into the prevailing mode, dab your nose with powder and fly down to breakfast. Yes, your worst fears are realized; someone has eaten your bacon; the girl next to you is wearing a satisfied air. You gulp down what remains, snatch up your hat and bag, and speed forth, pulling on gloves as you go.

You have not hastened far on your way before you fall in with one or two friends, and you all scuttle along together, taking little time for the genial flow of conversation. By the time you have reached your place of business, the army of fellow-workers has swelled to such proportions that you are jostled badly. You are jostled still more as the crowd seethes into the side street, and crams itself into the employees' entrance of the store. You have learned, however, that by scouting along close to the wall, you can dodge the gouging elbows more easily, and you finally reach your own locker, jerk off hat and coat, snap up your time-card, elbow your way through the "ringing-in" process, and pass the time-office. The manager of the time-office, Mr. Collins by name, but respectfully referred to as Papa Collins, stands at the door of the time office, like a statue of avenging justice, bristling down upon the passing throng. If you manage to pass the time-office unscathed, you join the marshalled forces teeming through the subway which leads to the store proper. The girls are all engaged in putting their hair to rights; you of course, are no exception to the general rule.

Promptness is rigidly enforced, so there is always a frenzied rush of late-comers on the eleva-

"He saw you! Isn't he the old shark?"

tors and stairs. You must be in your own "circle"—the shop-name for the counter at which you work—at ten minutes before the time for opening the store, so, when you reach your own floor, you do a regular Marathon for your own department, glancing over your shoulder at the big clock in the centre of the store. If it tells the sad truth, you cast your eye about for the manager, to make sure that he has not seen you. This however, is labor lost; he may be leaning ever so absent-mindedly against the counter, and you may approach behind him, ever so strategically, and whisk in, much to the stifled excitement of the other girls who have the gate open for you, but he never fails to glance up just as you frisk surreptitiously through the gateway, and the girls groan, "Aw! he saw you. Isn't he the old shark? There's another half-dollar off your bonus."

You take on an air of unconcern. What is a half-dollar to you anyway? You slide back one of the panels which form the back of the counter, and fling your bag into the aperture within, known as the "bunk," and from it you haul your apron, with its scissors, pencil and tape-line dangling from it, and proceed to don this indispensable garment.

THIS arranged, you grope about in the bunk until you chance upon a duster and set to work at the boxes on the counter, removing lids, arranging the goods, setting up tickets and dusting as you go. At least you perform these offices unless you have arrived sufficiently late to have it all finished before you arrive. In that case there is no hard feeling whatever in the matter; there is a splendid spirit among shop-girls, especially among those of your own circle, that is hard to find elsewhere.

When all has been made ready for the day's work, your pencils sharpened, fresh tally-cards in your cheque-book, and the goods and counter ready for business, all the girls compose themselves along the counter to await the first rush of custom.

You can see the restless mob of bargain-seekers thronged at all the street doors, the doors flung open to the morning air and but one lone man posted at each door to hold the crowd at bay, until the opening gong shall sound. Eight-thirty strikes, the dignified officer beats a retreat just a trifle too swift for dignity, and, inside of two minutes, the great store is seething with customers, pouring in from all sides, scurrying and jostling.

With the first onslaught, you stiffen your back for the fray. A great many women shoot past, always pausing long enough in their flight to snatch up four or five gloves and drop them again on the wrong piles, as they hasten away. Very few stop long enough to really buy anything at this first rush hour, in the fear lest other bargains may be falling to some one else, somewhere else, while they linger.

By the time that the eager ones have scouted around the entire store and taken a general survey, the selling for the day actually begins, but the eight-thirty-bargain spirit seems to inspire the shoppers for the first hour or two. If three or four women cluster about some article on the counter, in three minutes it will have attracted such a swarm of customers, clutching, pushing and pleading with you to wait on them, that you are almost overwhelmed. The busier you become, the more girls the manager sends in from other circles, and the more violent waxes the struggle to move about behind the counter.

The sale fever abates, however, as the morning advances, and although we have always with us the eager shoppers inquiring, "Any sales on to-day?" "Have you any long silks, reduced?" or "Oh, is this just the regular price?" still our mornings settle down to a comparative calm, when the customers happen along one-by-one, and you have some spare time for ticketing. This is sewing a price-ticket on each pair of gloves, and it is a proceeding which occupies a good deal of your mornings, since it is simple

Build Your Own Dog House and Make One of Your Best Friends Happy

HOME-MADE FURNITURE

THE SECOND ARTICLE

THE first article of this series set forth the need of a work bench and tool chest, and also gave instructions as to the making of a bird house, one of the simplest structures known, and one which is growing in popularity for Canadian gardens. With each article, a design is given and also a mill bill for lumber, so that the home worker may have the necessary instructions and guidance.

At the outset of the series, says the writer, I wish to speak of a variety of things, in order to appeal to a wider audience, and to broaden the scope, as much as possible, within the necessary limits. My purpose is to lay the foundation for an all-round equipment that can be utilized to suit the requirements of individual aims and capacity, whether limited to the building of a dove cote, a piece of fine interior work or a house-boat. In each case the structural qualities will be prominently brought out, as the importance of these must be realized.

In the choice of woods it is important that we select the kind best suited to the requirements of the piece we are to make. If our article is to be plain and primitive in construction, as, for example, a child's chair, woods should be chosen that have a texture and color quality, like the oak, chestnut, and brown ash, which, when properly finished, will be found to add much to the satisfying quality of the piece and make up for many seeming defects.

If the piece is to be exposed to the weather, as in the case of the bird house or dog kennel, cypress, spruce, California red wood and white cedar give the most pleasing effects when finished with the well known "shingle stains" or with linseed oil, to which the desired color has been added, and then left to weather.

This simple process of treating surfaces can be developed to a high degree of artistic tone and texture, and later in these talks we hope to tell you something about how to select special woods for special purposes, and how to treat the surfaces in order to bring out all the natural beauty of the grain without destroying it with varnish, or hiding it under a coat of paint.

WHILE these are to be practical lessons in actual wood-working I deem it of the highest practical importance, even thus early in the series, to give a few suggestions on "Individualism in Design." It is well for the beginner to work from good models designed for him, and to do his work thoroughly and well. But it is equally good for him—and far more important in the end—that he begin to look around at the source of all inspiration, Nature, and think for himself to the end that he create his own designs. A copyist can never be a real artist, no matter what the field in which he works. He may have the greatest ability in the world to alter and change and combine, but if he seeks for his inspiration solely from what someone else has done, he is a copyist and not an artist. It is what we do ourselves, of our own impelling, that is of value to us.

In cabinet making I would suggest the fullest exercise of this free spirit. Think for yourself. Design to meet your own demands. Work out problems of your own. Don't do things in a certain way because other people do them, but because you have decided that that is the best possible way. If you can see a better way go ahead and try it.

Yet here it is essential that one most important principle be not overlooked. Remember this. Never do a thing unless something definite justifies it. Don't follow your own whims, any more than you follow those of other people. Do things because they need to be done. Let your design grow out of necessity. Many of the most strikingly artistic and beautiful things that have come down to us out of the past were made simply because the creators met each difficulty in a masterly way as it arose.

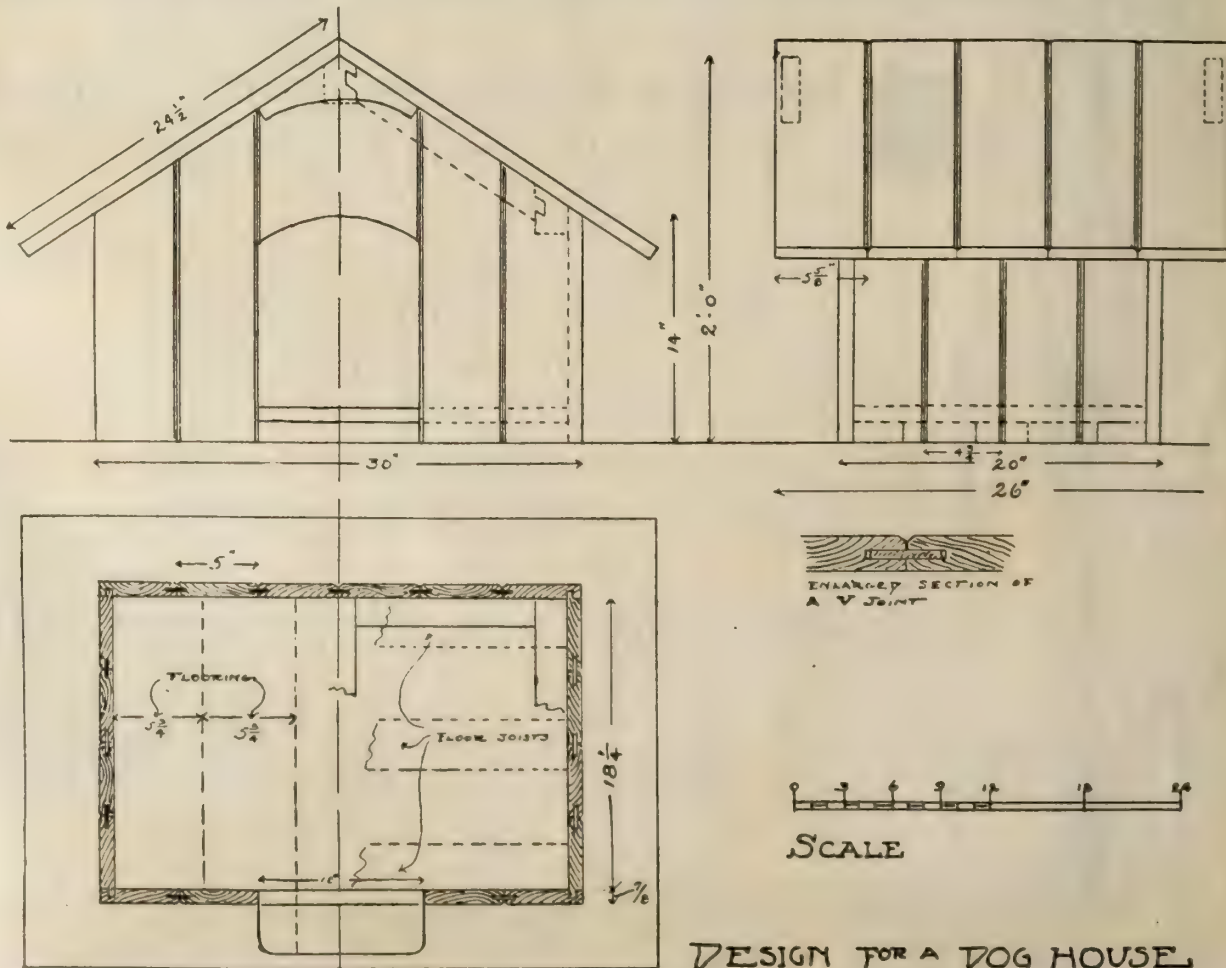

It must also be distinctly understood that the proper preparation for this freedom can only come to full fruition by compelling your hands to obey you in doing whatever you have undertaken. Bliss Carman never wrote a truer thing than when he said: "I have an idea that evil came on earth when the first man or woman said, 'That isn't the best I can do, but it is well enough.' In that sentence the primitive curse was pronounced, and until we banish it from the world again, we shall be doomed to inefficiency, sickness and unhappiness. In nature nothing is slighted, but the least and the greatest of tasks are performed with equal care, and diligence. . . . We should never stop short of an utmost effort toward perfection, so long as there is a breath in our body."

IN building the dog house, first lay down the floor joists and on them nail the floor—then put on the sides, ridge beam and rafters, which have been framed together, and the roof goes on last of all—glue and nail the parts together well, so that the house will be strong.

The Modern Way

Is Lemon with the Tea

IN the famous restaurants and hotels the world over—lemon juice is fast displacing cream in tea. People seldom serve tea now without a “dash of lemon” in it. And it isn’t merely “fashion” that has made this almost universal custom.

That incomparable tang that lemons add to scores of foods especially enhances the flavor of the finest teas.

And lemon juice is a rare appetizer—a digestive aid—due to the valuable salts and acids it contains.

So here are two reasons, besides the mere question of fashion, that should decide you to serve lemons with your tea.

Tea is better, and is better for you, when you have learned to “prefer a slice of lemon.”

To Relieve and Prevent Colds

Hot lemonade, sweetened with sugar, is a most refreshing drink. It is also a good stopping-off for a hot bath and before retiring. Drink the hot lemonade, get into bed, and you will feel better and cover well on your perspire toils.

The "Little Sister" and her Place in the Social Service Scheme

By
Mona H. Coxwell

NOT more than a hundred years ago it is recorded that a boy was hanged in England for stealing sheep. The impossibility of such a miscarriage of justice occurring to-day sheds light upon the progress that has been made during the last century in meting punishment that is comparatively proportionate to the crime. To-day, happily, there are separate courts for children, where the youth, inexperience and undeveloped judgment of the offender is balanced against the weight of the offence committed. Indeed, the juvenile courts to-day do even more than apprehend and punish for a crime committed; they not only by investigation discover whether, as is often the case, the parents of the child are themselves contributing to its delinquency and therefore equally culpable, but they throw a cordon of protection about their proteges by putting them under the supervision of a probation officer, whose duty it is to keep in touch with the children and assume a certain amount of the responsibility for their good behavior.

Some years ago in the city of New York it was found advisable to supplement the work of the trained probation officers with assistance from private individuals who would be willing to take over cases ready for discharge and carry on the work of supervision. It was for this purpose that a number of public-spirited citizens formed themselves into what was known as the Big Brother Association, and that later the Big Sister Association came into being.

The need for such an association had been felt in Toronto for some years when, in 1913, Commissioner Starr, of the Juvenile Court, appealed to the Local Council of Women for assistance in providing the ill-privileged, overworked and badly-housed girls of the community with wholesome interests and entertainment that would safeguard them against the evils which lead directly or indirectly to the city court. The response from the Local Council was immediate, and a "Big Sister" committee was formed. There is nothing more appealing to women than the suffering or unhappiness of children, and therefore the sympathy and enthusiasm was unbounded that the members of the committee brought into the work which they had undertaken. Within three years their activities had outgrown mere committee work, and it was found necessary to form what was henceforth known as "The Big Sister Association," thus establishing the first, and as yet the only, organization of its kind in Canada. Miss Hilda Burns was elected first president of the new organization, and in the following year was succeeded by Mrs. Franklin Johnson. Under both these capable officers the association broadened the scope of its work, laid plans for future activities and steadily grew in value to the community.

Preventive social work is the chief aim of the Big Sister Association. It interests itself mainly with the girl who is in need of friendship, of wholesome recreation—not especially of "uplift," but of a lift upward. It has no desire to patronize, but rather seeks to help to its own level someone who through an accident of birth and circumstances has been deprived of the sweeter things of life. It offers friendship and deep personal interest and asks in return confidence and loyalty to the ideals for which it stands.

AS the Association becomes better known—and here we might say that its only advertising medium is through its members and those whom it has helped—applications for assistance become more frequent. Perhaps it is a mother who asks for advice in guiding a headstrong daughter; perhaps it is a teacher who seeks co-operation in dealing with a refractory child. But one of the greatest and most pathetic evidences of the need which it fills is the fact that the girls apply themselves for help and friendship, and these, one may well believe, are never refused them. To what proportion the work has grown may be judged by the fact that the Association has at the present time, besides the general secretary, Mrs. Mary E. Laughton, B.A.,

"Lord, let me live while I can see
The beauty in the blossoming tree.
The message in the wayside flower,
And love it for its one short hour;
While morning song of lark and jay,
Can scatter all my doubts away,
And lift my poor heart from the sod,
And tell them I am born of God;
While I can feel I'm linked with all
The burdened ones who halt and fall,
While I can feel my share of blame
In every cheek that's dyed with shame,
While I can feel life's burdens sweep
Across my heart and drive out sleep,
While I can suffer, hunger, strive,
Lord, let me live
—for I'm alive.

But if the time should come when I
Forget to lift my eyes on high,
Forget to seek for love divine,
Or seek it but for me and mine;
When my dim eyes shall fail to trace
Thy image in each human face,
When lulled by comfort, ease and pride,
I find my soul is satisfied
To build its house of wood and hay,
Letting the old world go its way,
Content to preen before a glass
Where wounded ones barefooted pass,
Easing my conscience if I must
By throwing hungry dogs a crust,
Then, Lord, Thy crowning mercy shed
And let me die
—for I am dead." —Selected.

three field secretaries who cover the city in divided districts, and that within a short time it will be necessary to add again to the staff.

Since no sound institution entrusts its management to the hands of inexperienced directors, so the Big Sister Association recognized the need of trained social workers to deal with the investigation of cases and to ascertain the requirements of its proteges. Under their advice, clothing, money or food may be given to a girl should she require them. A situation may be found for her, or if her health requires attention, she is accompanied to a hospital and the necessary arrangements for medical treatment are made. Legal advice is given free to girls, and adults who have harmed them are brought to justice. Recently a scholarship fund has been established to enable ambitious girls to continue their schooling who would otherwise be forced by family circumstances to begin the battle of life unprepared by education. It is after they have passed through the hands of the trained worker that the volunteer "Big Sister" finds her share of work to be done, and it is then her duty to see the child each week and to maintain a kindly and persistent supervision. Just what vistas of happiness the friendship of a fine and wholesome girl or woman who has it in her means to show kindness to a child who has been denied all the luxuries of life can scarcely be estimated, but the thought will bear dwelling on, and may be the cause of inspiring more workers to enter this worthy field.

SINCE the Association had no desire to be a one-sided affair and deal only with the practical and work-a-day side of life, it originated plans for a club-house, a recreation centre where it would have something tangible to offer the girls in the way of comfort, entertainment and sociability. A Big Sister Conference Club, consisting of active members, was formed in January of 1918, and though it was thought almost an impossibility on account of the financial strain resulting from the war, sufficient funds were acquired within a few months to undertake the rental of a delightful residence on Carlton street for a clubhouse. This was opened on December fourteenth for public inspection, and two days later placed at the disposal of the girls.

My first introduction to the Girls' Club was a few weeks ago, when I called in the afternoon on the resident worker, Miss A. Hodgkins, and talked to her in her big, sunny office and learned a great deal I had not known before about the Girls' Club. Miss Hodgkins first showed me the little card that for the sum of twenty-five cents made any girl a member. There are a hundred and fifty members already, and there is never a night that does not bring its certain little group of visitors, looking for the entertainment that is always arranged for them. There are no rules—no regulations—none are needed. The girls are happy, and therefore they require no discipline. We strolled about the club. A big, bright front room is a library and a billiard room—the girls brought the billiard table themselves—a shining new beauty—and I was told they are exceedingly proud of it. There are sewing machines in an alcove of the room, too, always ready for any member to use. The guest room was charming—white enamel furniture, frilly white muslin curtains, a pretty sofa, a comfortable bed. No one who needs shelter is ever refused that dainty little room. The club had a guest that very day—a little girl of twelve whose story made you glad to think that there were big sisters to care for the little ones.

Downstairs there is a spacious drawing-room charmingly furnished with that indefinable air of "being lived in" about it, that always gives character to a room. The centre table held a bowl of fruit.

Uses a Talcum Powder which harmonizes with her dainty personality.

She does not desire one with a perfume too pronounced and which attracts unwelcome attention.

For such dainty women the Mennen Company have produced a range of exquisite Talcum Powders, delicately perfumed—the ideal Talcums for women of taste.

All Mennen Talcums are compounded on the same basis and with the same care as the famous Mennen Borated Talcum Powder used so successfully for 40 years for babies' tender skin. That in itself guarantees the quality—silky and soft, delicate and fragrant.

Mennen Violet Talcum is quiet and refreshing, with an old-world perfume of dew-crystallized violets—a perfume which has been the favorite of many generations of well-bred people.

Mennen Sen Yang has a perfume new to this continent. It is an elusive Oriental perfume, rapidly becoming a great favorite. The Mennen Company also, after long experiment, have produced two Talcum Powders which give perfect "complexion" satisfaction. One is Flesh Tint—the first Flesh Tint Talcum and the other Cream Tint, for those who find a white Talcum unbecoming.

A Perfect Day For The Baby Open Eyes To Baby's Needs

By DR. LAURA S. M. HAMILTON

A HOMELY saying with which we are all familiar is: "There are none so blind as those who won't see." Another version is: "Eyes have they and they see not, ears and hear not, hearts have they and they will not understand." This the negative while the positive is: "What we look for we find," and "Knock and it shall be opened unto you."

All nature is spread out before us like an open book, yet the standard of true education is so low that only a few have learned to read. I am not referring wholly to city-bound people now, but to thousands living daily among Nature's lessons and yet whose eyes are so bound that they cannot see. It was in the heart of the country that I was walking one evening, most misunderstood and stupidly treated.

All animals were originally created for out-of-door life. A few species e.g., men and moles, have become house-bound. The mole has thereby lost his eyesight, and man his health and vitality. All were likewise created naked, except such as had coats growing upon them. The clothing of these becomes thicker in cold weather or climates, and correspondingly thin in warm places. Some animals hide in burrows during the winter, which is equivalent to thicker clothing or housing. Man alone hangs clothing upon his body at all times and seasons with apparently little respect to climate or temperature. I refer of course to that section of

PRINCESS MARY ADMIRING THE BABIES

with a little river babbling at my side and lofty hills on either hand while the sun set slowly, gorgeously, the long rays of light slanting down, and athwart the valley and tinting the autumn foliage with exquisite coloring. It was almost oppressively beautiful, when I was roused out of my dream of color and light by a grunted "Evenin'" at my side. Turning, I saw an old, bent woman, dressed in rusty black, her eyes shaded by a broad hat, and her head bent down as she hobbled along. Returning her greeting, I said: "Isn't it beautiful? Do you know that the scenery in this valley has been compared to far famed Switzerland?" "I've lived here all my life," she said crossly, "an' I never seen nothin' beautiful about it." And she hobbled on toward the setting sun with her eyes bent always to the stepping of her own poor tired old feet.

All around in this spring time of the year Nature is bringing forth her babies. So many babies of so many different colors and shapes and voices. Yet in every phase of this baby life we may learn some lesson if we will that will help us to interpret the wonderful requirements of the most wonderful baby of them all—baby man.

Of all the babies, baby man is the most helpless, the most beautiful, and the most marvellously adjustable to climate and circumstances. Probably this last is what makes it possible to add that he likewise appears to be humanity, which is called civilized or Christianized.

Some animals are carnivorous, some herbivorous, some omnivorous. Man belongs to the latter class. But for the first six to nine months of his life he is exclusively carnivorous. A knowledge of this fact by his worthy parents might save him and them much trouble. Be it noted, too, that the first teeth he gets are not such as belong to herbivorous, or wholly vegetable eating animals. But sharp little biting and tearing teeth, the flat grinders coming a good deal later. Digestive juices corresponding with the class of teeth cut are produced about the same time as the different kinds of teeth.

Milk is a wholly animal or proteid food, and upon his mother's milk only should baby man be fed until after several teeth have been erupted. And then he should not be dosed with soft stuff and "slops" alone. Imagine a baby tiger or lion, or monkey or chicken fed only soft stuff! They bite and chew and pick from the commencement. They are following Nature's guidance wholly. And in their native states they require no castor oil nor calomel, nor do they languish nor suffer from rickets, or other diseases of nutrition.

Nor are Nature's babies tied up in tight bands "to support them," nor shut out from air and sunshine behind closed doors and windows in artificially heated rooms. And they do not "catch cold" or have pneumonia, or eczema, or a score of other ills with which the "higher race" is tormented.

A happy Baby

This baby never cries because of chafes, as so many babies do.

Mother dusts the delicate skin with which prevents chafing.

MOTHERS

Do your babies cry in this hot weather? Are they fretful, with legs and backs all red and raw?

Hot weather is trying to the sensitive skins of babies. They perspire very easily. Their tender skins become so soft that the least rubbing almost tears. A too-tight binder or the edge of a diaper may easily be torment to them.

Look at baby after being undressed, and if diaper rash is evident or redness shows that clothes have chafed—dust at once with and see that baby gets relief. But prevention is better than cure. If your baby is all right now—avoid future trouble of this kind by using for it prevents as well as heals.

MENNEN

KORA-KONIA

MENNEN

KORA-KONIA

It is a soft, silky, medicated powder, specially prepared to comfort and soothe the tender skin of babies. It is made by Mennen, who has been making the famous Borated Talcum Powder for babies for 40 years. KORA-KONIA is more than a Talcum Powder. It has medicinal ingredients which heal as well as soothe. It forms a thin protective film over the tender places and guards from rubbing whilst it helps Nature to heal.

A Variety of Pretty Cookery Cases

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "THE THRIFT COOK BOOK."

ONE of the prettiest features in modern cookery is the use of all kinds of dainty cases made of various materials, and used as receptacles for fillings of different sorts.

These little cases are suited either for high-class cookery or for use in the home, where the housewife receives no assistance, and consequently cannot devote a great amount of time to the dressing and decoration of her dishes. They offer special advantages in the latter event, as by their aid it is so easy to produce a good effect with a minimum of trouble, while they may, as a rule, be prepared beforehand (at least as far as the cases themselves are concerned), leaving only the filling to be attended to at the last moment.

Perhaps the simplest illustration of the idea is the potato, hominy or corn meal cassiolette. These are exceedingly easy to make and they may be filled with small, cooked vegetables, or a savory mince, or ragout, of fish, meat or poultry, according to taste and convenience. These cassiolettes may be made very small and used as a garnish for serving round some other dish.

Highly useful little cases may also be made from fried bread, and may be filled with sweet or savory mixtures.

Again, for the serving of ice cream, the little ready-made cones and the cases which can be made with wafers or crackers present simple ways of dispensing ices at entertainments, or otherwise.

Still another type of case is made by removing the interior of small or large cakes and filling these with ices, custards or fruits.

It will thus be seen that the subject of cases is no brief one, even without touching on the claims of the ever useful paper cases, now to be seen in such immense variety, and which are such an invaluable aid to neat and dainty service.

Nouille Cases With Creamed Fish.—Make a stiff paste with one cupful of flour, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, two yolks of eggs and a little milk. Roll this pastry out as thin as a wafer, and line some small tins with it, pressing it well into the tins to prevent air bubbles. Bake for ten or fifteen minutes in a moderate oven. Fill with creamed fish and serve hot.

These nouille cases may be filled with cheese soufflé made as follows: In a small saucepan over the fire, blend two tablespoonfuls of butter and four tablespoonfuls of flour, add one-half cupful each of milk and cream, and stir until boiling, season to taste with salt, pepper and paprika, add the yolks of three eggs, one-half cupful of grated cheese and the whites of eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Bake some nouille cases for a few minutes, fill each one-half full with the mixture and bake till well puffed up and lightly browned. Serve immediately.

Meringue Cases With Apple Sauce.—Make some meringue mixture, allowing two tablespoonfuls of sugar to each white of egg. Beat up the whites of eggs to a stiff froth, then add the sugar lightly and quickly. Cut some narrow strips of white paper, and fasten the ends together with a little white of egg to form rings about the size of a napkin ring. Put the meringue into a forcing bag with a small tube and pipe it round the paper ring to form a case. Dry in a very moderate oven until beginning to color.

When they are crisp the paper will be quite easily detachable from the inside of the cases, but it must be removed with care. Stand each case on a thin round of cake. At serving time fill the centres with thick apple sauce and heap whipped and sweetened cream on the top. These little meringue cases may be used for various purposes; they may be filled with ice cream and the top sprinkled with chopped nuts, or fresh fruit may be used instead of a sauce.

Potato Cases Filled With Peas.—Beat one and one-half pounds of boiled potatoes until quite smooth and light, season to taste with pepper and powdered nutmeg, add two tablespoonfuls of butter, and the yolks of two eggs, and beat until these ingredients are well blended. When cool roll out, using just sufficient flour to make this possible, to the thickness of about two inches. Cut out into rounds the size of a tumbler, and with a smaller cutter remove a piece from the top of each as though making pastry patties. Brush them over with beaten egg, toss them in fine bread crumbs, place in a frying basket and fry to a light brown in hot fat. Fill the cavities with nicely seasoned cooked peas, and place the piece removed from the centre on top of the peas to form a lid. This dish should be served hot.

Sponge Cake Cases Filled With Berries.—Make some sponge cake by any approved recipe and bake in individual moulds. When cold cut a piece from the centre of each. Fill the cavity thus made with ripe, sweetened berries. Pipe a little whipped and sweetened cream around them, and cut strips of candied peel to form handles. These may be varied by using different fruits according to the season.

Stewed Cherries in Puff Paste Cases.—Roll out puff pastry to rather more than one-fourth inch in thickness. Let it rest for a few minutes to allow for shrinking, and cut into rounds with a plain or fluted cutter two and one-half inches in diameter. Moisten the edges of the whole rounds with water, and lay the rings on the top. Place the cases on a baking tin, and prick the centres with a fork and put in a small round piece of stale bread to prevent them rising. Brush over with beaten egg, and bake in a hot oven for twenty minutes. On another tin put the small rounds cut from the centres of the rings, brush them over with beaten egg, and bake for ten minutes. These serve for covers. When the patties are ready allow to cool and fill with stewed cherries. Top with whipped and sweetened cream and preserved cherries.

A great variety of mixtures may be made for filling the puff paste cases. A good sauce, with or without cream, forms the foundation of these mixtures. Small tasty pieces of meat, game, fish, vegetables, and eggs can all be utilized for the purpose.

Timbale Cases With Creamed Peas.—Three-fourths cupful of flour, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of milk, one egg, and one tablespoonful of olive oil. Sift the flour and the salt together, add the milk and eggs, well beaten, gradually, then stir in the olive oil. Put a timbale iron into hot fat, deep enough to cover it and let it get hot. Pour the batter into a cup, lower the hot iron into the cup to about three-fourths its depth. Then immerse the iron in the hot fat again, the mixture will rise to the top and when brown and crisp, it will slip off easily. If the case is not crisp, it is because the batter is too thick. In that case thin with milk. Fill with creamed peas and serve hot.

These cases may also be filled with sweet mixtures. Choose ripe fruit, pick it, and put it into a bowl. Put one-half cupful of sugar and one-fourth cupful of water into a saucepan, and boil to a thick syrup, but do not let them color. Add a little fruit syrup or extract to flavor. Pour this syrup over the fruit, and stand in a warm place for forty minutes. Then lift out the fruit carefully, place it in the cases, and pour two teaspoonfuls of the syrup over. Serve either hot or cold. A spoonful of whipped and sweetened cream may be put on the top of each just before serving. Stoned cherries, strawberries or raspberries may be used.

Little Ginger Soufflés.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan over the fire, add one-half cupful of milk, and two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, and stir over hot water until thick and smooth. Remove the pan from the fire, add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one-fourth cupful of ginger syrup and four tablespoonfuls of chopped ginger. Mix well, add the yolks of two eggs one at a time, beating well between each, then fold in the stiffly beaten whites of three eggs. Grease small paper cases, three-fourths fill them with the mixture, and bake in a hot oven for fifteen minutes.

Top with the stiffly beaten whites of two eggs mixed with two tablespoonfuls of sugar and chopped preserved ginger. Serve hot.

Cream Puffs.—Into a saucepan put one-half cupful of butter and one cupful of water, bring to boiling point, add quickly one cupful of sifted flour and stir well with a wooden spoon until the dough leaves the sides of the pan. Cool slightly, add a pinch of salt and four eggs one by one, beating each one in thoroughly. Bake in greased muffin rings and when cold fill with either whipped cream flavored and sweetened to taste; or a custard made with two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch mixed with four tablespoonfuls of sugar, four eggs and four cupfuls of milk. Decorate with whipped and sweetened cream and chopped nut meats.

Peach Gâteau En Surprise.—Bake a plain sponge cake in a round tin. When cold scoop out the centre, fill with stewed or canned peaches and pile on the top with meringue. Brown lightly in the oven. Brush the sides of the cake with warm jelly and cover with chopped nut meats. Serve with cream or a sweet white sauce.

Olives in Egg Cases.—Make some cases of hard-cooked white of egg. Pour one teaspoonful of liquid aspic jelly into each and allow to partly set. Allow an olive for each case. Soak in water and stone. Pound yolks with some chopped cooked ham, and rub through a sieve. Put mixture into a forcing bag with small tube, force some into each olive, and stand them in the aspic. Serve garnished with parsley.

Refreshing Yet Nourishing Dishes

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "ECONOMICAL COOKERY."

WITH the arrival of warm weather, comes the demand for tempting dishes that are refreshing and yet nourishing. Meats come under a class covered by the second term, for they are without doubt one of the most nutritious foods that exist, but they can hardly be called refreshing, for they give more heat than the body requires in the summer time. Therefore many people endeavor to abstain from the use of meats during the warm months, basing their diets, rather, on such substitutes for meats as salad, eggs, cheese savories and other dishes like those given below.

Rice Timbale.—Wash and dry one-half pound of rice, put it into a saucepan with four cupfuls of cold water and bring to boiling point; then take from the fire and drain. Wash out the saucepan and put back the rice, adding six cupfuls of hot milk, one tablespoonful of butter, and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Place this over the fire, and when it comes to a boil, cover and let it simmer on the back of the range for forty minutes without stirring. Then add one-half cupful of sugar or honey and let the mixture stand for ten minutes more without cooking. Beat up the yolks of three eggs, add three tablespoonfuls of cream and one teaspoonful of vanilla extract and mix with the rice. When partly cool, add one cupful of whipped cream or whipped evaporated milk, and fold it in lightly. Now grease a mould and put in it alternate layers of rice and peach or orange marmalade, having the top layer of rice. Chill thoroughly for four hours, then turn out and decorate with fresh fruit.

Nasturtium Salad.—This is a delightful, spicy salad and most decorative for the Sunday or company dinner. Pick a number of leaves and blossoms of nasturtiums, wash well in cold water and shake dry. Arrange in a shallow glass dish, leaves and flowers forming a border and stems running to the centre of the dish. Take three cold boiled potatoes and slice very thin. Peel an equal quantity of tomatoes and slice thin. Then arrange potatoes and tomatoes in alternate circles, covering the stems of the flowers, and sprinkle with a little chopped onion and parsley. Pour over French dressing and serve when thoroughly chilled.

Panned Tomatoes.—Wash good sized firm tomatoes and cut in halves. Put skin side downwards in a greased fireproof dish. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter on each tomato, sprinkle with salt, pepper and paprika, then bake until soft but not broken. Have in readiness as many slices of buttered toast as you have tomatoes, and lift the tomatoes on to the toast. Make a gravy in the usual way, pour over the tomatoes and toast and serve hot.

Clabber.—This is thickened milk. This dish is perfection in the summer when milk sours and thickens quickly. Serve it very cold. A good way is to pour the milk, before it thickens, into the glass dish it is to be served in; when thickened set it on ice for an hour or so. Serve on small plates with grated maple sugar, and a little powdered nutmeg, if desired.

Stuffed Carrots.—Wash and scrape ten carrots, put them into a saucepan of boiling salted water, and cook them for ten minutes. Drain and allow to cool, then hollow out the centre of each. Cook sufficient peas to make one-half cupful of purée. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in a saucepan, put in the purée of peas, stir until mixed, season with salt, pepper and paprika, and stir in the beaten yolk of one egg. Mix thoroughly and allow to cool. Put this mixture into a forcing bag with a tube attached, and fill the centres of the carrots with it. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, put in the stuffed carrots, cover with the lid of the pan, and cook gently for five minutes, then add one cupful of stock or gravy, and simmer until the carrots are tender. Dish up in a pile, or in a circle, on a hot dish, remove the fat from the liquor in the pan, and pour it round the carrots. Serve hot.

Corn Chowder.—Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter, add two sliced onions and cook until slightly browned. Parboil one cupful of sliced potatoes for five minutes, drain and add to onion, then add one can of corn and three cupfuls of water and cook for thirty minutes. Blend one tablespoonful of butter and one tablespoonful of flour with two and one-half cupfuls of milk, and cook until smooth and thick. Combine mixtures, add one-half cupful of cracker crumbs, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper and serve.

Eggs, Asparagus and Cheese Sauce.—Boil four eggs hard, then place them in cold water to chill thoroughly; peel and cut them into quarters, lengthwise. Cut the crusts from eight pieces of buttered toast, and arrange the bread on a hot platter. Set two pieces of egg on each piece of toast, and in the centre of the dish place a bunch of hot, boiled asparagus tips. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, stir in two tablespoonfuls of flour, pour in one cupful of milk and stir until it boils. Season to taste with salt and pepper, add one cupful of grated cheese and allow it to melt. Pour part of this sauce over the eggs and asparagus, and serve the remainder separately, to be used as wanted.

Sardines in Batter.—Wipe and skin eight sardines. Dip the sardines into batter, drop them into smoking hot fat, and fry until crisp and a golden brown. Dish them in a pile on a hot dish, sprinkle over some grated cheese, and garnish with parsley. To make the batter, sift one cupful of flour into a bowl, add a pinch of salt, one tablespoonful of olive oil, one beaten egg, and one-half cupful of milk, and beat until smooth and glossy. Allow to stand in a cool place for thirty minutes, then add one teaspoonful of baking powder and use.

Potatoes With Beets.—Peel and wash eight potatoes, put them into a saucepan, cover with cold water, add one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, and cook until half done. They should not be quite cooked for this dish. Let the potatoes cool, then cut them in thick slices. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in a frying pan, when hot, put in the potatoes, and fry lightly, then add four cooked and sliced beets, two chopped onions, one cupful of stock or water, the strained juice of one-half lemon, salt and pepper to taste. Simmer gently for twenty minutes. Arrange on a hot dish and serve.

Macaroni With Tomato Sauce.—Boil one-half of a package of macaroni in boiling salted water for thirty minutes, then drain and keep hot. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, and when melted stir in one chopped onion, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth teaspoonful each of pepper and paprika. Cook together for eight minutes, then add one tablespoonful of flour mixed with one cupful of stewed or canned tomatoes, and stir and cook for eight minutes longer. Butter a baking dish, put a layer of macaroni in it, then a layer of sauce, and so on until the dish is full; let the last layer be of macaroni. Bake in the oven for ten minutes and serve hot.

Moulded Salad.—Pour liquid aspic jelly into small wet individual charlotte russe moulds, and turn out at serving time on to small serving plates. Fill with cooked peas and garnish with shredded lettuce or watercress and fancy cut lemons. Serve with mayonnaise dressing to which has been added one-half cupful of whipped cream or whipped evaporated milk. The jelly may be molded in cups, and the centres removed with a warm spoon.

MOTORING weather has arrived—of course all weather is motoring weather, but for thorough enjoyment of a drive, give me the sunshiny days and warm evenings with purple, crimson and gold sunsets, and mornings, if you are of the early bird variety, when the breeze is warm upon your cheeks. Days when we reap the reward of patiently enduring work and stormy weather and may, with a clear conscience, toss our hat in the air and shout: "Hip, hurrah, for the Holidays!" Glorious days, but hark you, dangerous days to the complexion. Not even now may we relax our vigilance upon the skin that we have gently and perseveringly cared for in the shut-in weather, lest the elements play havoc with it. Never must we go a-motoring without a careful thought of the effect of wind and sun and dust upon the rose-leaf texture of our complexion. Rose-leaf, you say—save the mark!—but if not, why not, dear ladies? As I have told you many a time and oft, it is a simple thing to cultivate a lovely skin.

Whether or not our complexion is such as to cause us vanity, it is no more than sensible to protect it to a certain extent from the ravages of summer weather. If it were only to prevent the unpleasantness of sunburn, it would be wise. Even in my very young and foolish days, I never was in sympathy with the summer girls who deliberately set out to acquire a coat of tan, and vied with one another as to the deepest burning of face and neck and arms. Perhaps it was because sunburn was to me such an unhappy thing; I have a recollection of a summer when the pain of a blistered nose and cheeks, kept me awake three long and restless nights and made me an unholy object to look upon. Even to this day I have a feeling of deep faith in carron oil which was the first remedy to bring me relief and to reduce the swelling.

Suppose now that you are contemplating a motor journey of some length, and that the matter of compact luggage is something that must be considered. Whatever must be omitted let nothing prevent you taking a few of those preparations necessary to complexion comfort. For instance, there must be included a large pot of cleansing and healing cream. This will be needed sadly at the end of each day to remove the dust that has accumulated in the pores. It is not wise to wash the face, even with the best of soap, at the end of a dusty journey without first applying a generous quantity of cleansing cream and removing the outside dirt with a soft cloth. After that, the soap and warm water, and if you are then retiring for the night, the further application of a skin-food or an antiseptic cream would be advisable. In the morning bathe the face first with clear warm water and then with cold to close the pores. A good foundation cream comes next, lightly rubbed into the skin and then a dusting with powder. These two make an excellent protection against the effect of wind and sunshine, but you must not depend upon them alone. A further shading must be provided by a brimmed hat—not necessarily wide-brimmed, but broad enough to cast a shadow and to save the eyes from the glare of the road. Sun-burn in the eyes, as anyone who has experienced it will tell you, is exceedingly painful, and I should advise those who contemplate a motor journey of length, to provide themselves with glasses of a brown or blue or green shade. They are far from being an affectation, as I have heard them branded.

Speaking of the eyes, our motor toilet kit should not be without an eye cup and a bottle of boracic acid diluted with water. With this it is well to wash out the eyes at the end of every day's journey. It is one of the best preventives of headache and relief from unnatural strain on the eyesight.

The hair, too, should be given especial care during the night stops for rest and refreshment.

While one's hat protects it to a certain extent, there is an accumulation of dust that must be given a stiff brushing to dislodge. There is also an erroneous opinion that some people hold, that any old gloves will do to drive in, but this is not the case, unless one is none too particular about the condition of hands and nails. Old gloves are as a rule, thin or holey gloves and in that case the dust of the road has little trouble in sifting through them and collecting in the pores of the hands or in the cuticle of the nails. And this grime is difficult to displace, even with the most efficient of nail brushes. Therefore, it is an excellent thing to provide oneself with a pair of gloves that are new or at least intact.

After all, with a little extra precaution, there is no reason why the toilet made upon each fresh beginning of a motor journey should not be just as successful as one made in the sanctuary of one's own boudoir. The well-cared-for appearance not only adds to one's personal contentment but it is a delightful sop to the vanity to have someone exclaim: "My, how fresh and charming you look—not a bit dragged after your long journey."

To The Club Members:

There is an announcement to be made this month which will mean parting with an old friend and finding a new one. The leadership of the club is passing from Ethel Bain, who has so ably conducted it for some time, and in future will belong to Bertha E. Green, whose work is already known to many Canadian readers, and who will make her first appearance as conductor of the club in our August issue. Hence all members, new and old, are asked to write to Bertha E. Green that a new club register may be formed. Mrs. Green has written many original sketches for the Journal and is known also as the writer of "The Day Dodgers," which have appeared in a well-known weekly. So, please send us your stories and photographs just as soon as you have made up your mind to try for a prize or a place in the columns.

EDITOR,

PRIZE LETTER

"Fifty Thousand Dollars," by Wilfred I. Clark, age 12, Southend P. O., Ontario.

HEIR to fifty thousand dollars—I? Wonders will never cease. Who left this generous amount to me? That is more than I can answer—but here it is—fifty thousand dollars in real bills. What shall I do with it? Various ways of spending it flashed through my mind but I decided to ask my parents' advice before I did anything definite.

They immediately advised me to put four-fifths of it in the bank. Even that would leave ten thousand! Now, let's see—my shoes are getting old and I need a new suit—so does mother. All right!

I immediately bought the suits and shoes and (being fond of the movies) decided to visit them. I took my mother with me and we visited the best in town. Having enjoyed ourselves in that way we decided to take lunch in the city (as my father and brother were both away on business.)

After filling our capacities to a great extent, a thought suddenly took birth in the vicinity of my head—a trip to Niagara Falls—that would be splendid! Off we went, bought our tickets and took the next train to that place. We arrived about three o'clock in the afternoon and decided to go to it and enjoy ourselves as much as possible.

We took a trip on the Gorge car, stopping off at the Aerial Car Station, the Whirlpool, The Glen and the Devil's Hole, not to mention Brock's Monument, in turn spoken, arriving back at the Queen Victoria Park, five hours later. When night dreamily drifted upon us we made our way back to our hotel, as the trip was telling on our appetites.

The next day marked our return journey. My father and brother were glad to see us back.

Counting my money I still had ten thousand dollars, minus ten, left. I pondered upon what to do next—Oh! wonderful thought—a trip to England—wouldn't that be great?

I immediately announced to the family what I intended to do, to which they agreed with hearty enthusiasm.

Time flies as it always does and now comes the day upon which we return to our homeland.

We arrive at Victoria in British Columbia and make a straight-of-way to our home-town. On the train, we first came into contact with the fresh air of the mountains, then the smell of the prairie with its endless fields of wheat and ah—at last—the odour of blossoms—our own village. We are welcomed with hearty friendliness and settle down in our new twelve thousand dollar home! No more dishes for mother to wash. No more coal for me to carry. No more

A Story for the Small Person

The Land of P'raps

By BETH SADLEIR

THE travellers had just passed the flag that marked the first of the July road. At each side of the highway there were trumpet-flowers that played gay tunes, with noisy fire-cracker plants, and snapdragons that popped. It was a noisy thoroughfare, and a gay one, too, for all the brightest colored flowers were there, and every one in bloom.

It was a bright and happy journey along this first part of the July way. All of the wood-men had vanished. Diddy Happen and Dedder Naherrin walked side by side, the Tick-Tock brothers followed, while the little If walked between them, as if he were afraid of all the noise. It grew quieter, however, warmer and sunnier, as they walked onward. It grew hotter still, which was most unfortunate, for Tick and Tock. Their shiny cardboard suits began to crack and curl out of shape, and the yellow and blue paint blistered and peeled. So it was with much relief that Diddy and his friends saw in front of them a broad blue lake, with little cream-puff waves upon it. Even old Dedder Naherrin quickened his steps, while the If galloped madly toward the water, his tiny alarm clock clanging loudly as it swung from the tip of his curly tail.

Diddy was soon knee-deep in the cool waters. Old Dedder Naherrin stopped to take off his shoes, and the If swam around, blowing and puffing.

The Tick-Tock brothers rushed into the lake, without stopping to leave their clocks on dry land. This was disastrous, for their cardboard suits could not keep out the water, but soaked right through, softened, and then fell off.

It was then that Diddy and Dedder noticed Tick and Tock, who now came back to the shore again. They had the same faces, and they still carried their clocks, but otherwise they would never look the same again. The Tick-Tock brothers without their shiny suits were, Diddy saw, but two word-men.

As Diddy watched them, each of the brothers shrank until he became smaller than the clock he had been carrying. When each one was only as tall as a match, he opened a door in the back of his clock and stepped inside. Then Diddy knew that the clocks were the homes of the Tick-Tock brothers, and he could hear them busy in their houses.

So Diddy, Dedder, and the If were once more alone, and, moving the Tick-Tock houses to the side of the road, they continued their journey, but not far. The lake was in front of them, and there was no boat, or Pink Star, or June-Bug, to carry them across.

While they were wondering how they would ever get across, countless small creatures rose to the surface of the water. They all had little hooked arms, which they immediately used to lock themselves together. This was the way to cross the lake, for the little creatures had made a floating bridge for the travellers to walk upon.

"They're handy and obliging chaps are the Ands," said Dedder Naherrin. "They are always joining things, and, luckily for us, they join this shore and the far one."

As they stepped on dry land again, the Ands disappeared as quickly as they had come; and none too soon, for a great many odd birds were swooping down.

"Why, they are the flying words!" exclaimed Diddy.

"Of course," said Dedder, "they are the Buts. Ands and Buts do not agree at all."

They climbed a hill, and at the very top of it found a letter-man sitting in the middle of the road, weeping bitterly. He stood up as they approached, and Diddy saw that his name was Down.

"Why are you crying?" asked Diddy.

"Because I have no right here, for the top of the hill belongs to the Ups."

"How did you ever get here?" asked Diddy.

"The wind caught me, carried me high, and dropped me on this hill-top," said the Down.

"Well, you don't need to stay here if you don't want to," said Dedder Naherrin.

"That's so," said the letter-man, "I never thought of that."

The Journal Puzzle for July

By TOM WOOD

915.8

Guess what each of these little pictures represents. If correct, the initials spell the name of the flower for July, and the finals spell what we expect the Summer holidays to be.

Two prizes will be given—first, two dollars, and second, one dollar—for the best solutions, judged according to neatness and accuracy.

All are eligible to compete. Answers must be received by July 20th to be included.

Enchanting— On Long Summer Evenings

If you are a trained musician, you will be most exacting as to tone quality when you select your phonograph.

If you, yourself, are not particularly critical, you will still wish to have the best—a phonograph you will feel proud to have your musical friends hear.

The Sonora is the leader in the phonograph world. It has won this supremacy because of its matchless tone—sweet, clear, true and incomparably lovely.

The Sonora received at the Panama-Pacific Exposition a higher marking for tone quality than that given any other phonograph.

The Sonora plays all records. Its cabinets are wonderfully beautiful—the finest examples of the woodworker's art.

Hear a piano record—the critical test of a phonograph—on the Sonora.

Nearly all Sonora Models are now made entirely in Canada.

ADVICE on a subject in which we are vitally interested, when it comes from an expert, is always eagerly and gratefully received. As a general thing it is rather difficult to find one so well versed in his field that what he tells us is not subject to argument and perhaps to successful contradiction. The position now surrounding us is that every expert on finance who deals with the matter at all, is advising the purchase of Canadian Victory Bonds. In financial matters it is not safe to lay down any cut and dried prophecy, no matter how strongly the facts at hand appear to bolster up the prediction.

EVERY man or woman who has money to invest should realize that investment is an expert science, and he who has not learned it must step warily until experience has matured his judgment and taught him what to avoid. I think one should form investment habits; that the older people should teach the younger ones what is good and what is bad, to the end that when the young married man comes to the point of finding lodgment for the first hundred or thousand dollars he has saved, or when the widow finds herself in possession of quite a large fund of money, either will have some proper idea of what is best to do. In this connection I would point out the importance of realizing the fact that there are in existence business organizations of reputation whose sole activity is in furnishing investment securities to those who are in the market to buy. The young or inexperienced person with capital, either large or small, has the option of putting himself in touch with one or more of these houses, or of ignoring them. If he ignores them, he is depriving himself of facilities which he simply cannot replace, and which will be freely placed at his disposal for the mere asking.

As an illustration, let us suppose that Mrs. Mary Jones finds herself a widow, and in the course of a short time is in receipt of a cheque for five thousand dollars from a life insurance corporation. Financial matters are more or less Greek to her. She finds the talk of "security," "interest," "dividends," "good collateral," "first mortgage gold bonds," and other common brokerage terms quite confusing. She has always trusted the banks until now, when she realizes she has not only a large sum of money at her disposal, but a fund also upon which she knows she must rely in part for her future means. She hesitates to place the entire amount in any bank. She timidly asks her lawyer what she shall do with the money. What does her lawyer know about investment? He has only a superficial knowledge. In many instances the lawyer is in the position that he will secure a commission for himself if he causes his client to invest in a mortgage. A mortgage is a very good type of security, but it is questionable whether it is the form of purchase for a woman in the condition we have imagined. She decides not to buy a mortgage, and asks Uncle John. Uncle John tells her he has drawn ten per cent. dividends for six years from a certain industrial stock. Of course, there may be some little risk in it, but on the whole he thinks if she can get her income from the insurance money up to five hundred dollars per annum, everything should be all right. Perhaps she still does not purchase, and then by degrees those persons who make a business of smelling out where the money is, learn of her funds. There then begins a bombardment of this widow by mail and in person. She is promised the most "absolute safety" coupled with a return of from ten to thirty per cent. per annum. If she can withstand the appeals and arguments of the magnetic individuals who are after her money, she has more good sense and hardihood than the average person.

Now, what I am getting at is that in none of the circumstances outlined above is there any certainty that the investor will place her money where she will still have possession of it; in other words, where her capital will be safe. If she buys Uncle John's common stock, with its ten per cent. dividends, she has parted with her money for good and all. She has "purchased" the common stock. Common stock promises her nothing. Common stock is not redeemable. True, if the company remains prosperous, and if there is a wide market for the stock, she can take advantage of the situation and sell her stock to another buyer. But, if business becomes bad, and the ten per cent. dividend is cut to five, or is dropped altogether, she has her common stock, but she has no claim on the company for anything. If the dividends are not earned, she is not entitled to any profits. She has not the right to say to the company: "I invested trust funds in your enterprise; you took my five thousand dollars; I desire to have it back now!" She does not possess this right, simply because the securities she acquired give her no such legal or other privilege. A broker of questionable reputation may, at one fell swoop, pounce upon this five thousand dollars, induce the owner to sign a paper, and the money will be lost to her forever. She may take a week, a month or a year to realize that she has been swindled. But the truth will come to her sooner or later. Just such things are happening every day.

SUPPOSE the owner of this five thousand dollars approached her banker for investment advice, or assume that she merely notices the advertisement in a newspaper or magazine of an investment house. If she forwards her name and address, one may say her troubles are over. Her money is practically safe from then on. She can let Uncle John and all her relatives and friends alone. She does not need their suggestions. She has put herself above and beyond them. What kind of investment house is this that is suggested?

What I have in mind is the corporation which deals exclusively in bonds of the best type, and which does not handle bonds or any other securities on a commission basis, but has adopted a procedure which is its own best protection and also that of the client. Such a house is amply supplied with capital. It buys outright with its own funds any bond issue it subsequently handles. It will not lend its name and its capital to securities without a most searching investigation. Having demonstrated to its own satisfaction that a block of say a million dollars' worth of securities is satisfactory for its purposes, it buys the entire issue, and pays its good money.

The clients of such a house are not speculators. They are the real investors, and the real investor is the man or woman who has learned that the most important thing for him is to keep his money, and next to receive some return on it, and third, to get the best return he can compatible with safety. Through this simple process of selecting the right people to deal with at the beginning, the inexperienced man or woman can be sure that he will not be swindled, that his funds will be secure, that there will be a good market for what he purchases, and that his income is assured.

A Greeting to the I.O.D.E.

AT the annual meeting of the I.O.D.E., held in Calgary, during the last week of May, the President of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, Mrs. Arthur Murphy of Edmonton, gave an address of greeting, welcoming the delegates in hearty and eloquent language, to the effect:

In carrying the greetings of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada to the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, now in conference, I feel myself to be both happy and honored.

As a usual thing, in Canada, our patriotic and philanthropic organizations have come to us from other lands after proving their worth elsewhere. These two sister organizations, however, have the unique distinction of native birth, having arisen to other portions of the Empire when similar needs arose.

When immigrants began to pour into this Dominion from foreign countries, certain wise Canadian women began to realize that to preserve our national heritage of the centuries we

The Women's Institutes arose out of the needs of lonely women on isolated farms. These women desired to meet at stated periods for the exchange of counsel and amenities, to say nothing of the opportunity of exchanging recipes, dress patterns, and community news. Many and remarkable have been the results which arose therefrom. One of the most valuable of these has been to stay the townward trend which was so sadly impoverishing the life of the country.

Another was that it taught the "home-tied woman" that she could profitably co-operate with the state—that "eternal feminine" was not to be eternal after all, any more than the "silent power" was to be silent. In a word, the Women's Institutes enabled the rural woman to find herself.

It has also taught her to become a producer in a very real and material manner. This was why, when it seemed during the war period that the British Empire might be disrupt-

AN INTERESTING GROUP

Mrs. Arthur Murphy, President Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, (left); Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, famous English speaker; Mrs. A. E. Gooderham, Past President of the I.O.D.E.; and Mrs. J. F. Price, Convener Publicity Committee, Federated Women's Institutes of Canada; taken at Calgary on the occasion when Mrs. Murphy presented greetings from the F.W.I. to the I.O.D.E. Convention held in that city, and made a plea that both organizations work together in the great problems of immigration, the combating of the propaganda now being disseminated to disrupt the friendly relations between the United States and the British Empire. "Germany may do in peace-time," said Mrs. Murphy, "what she did not do in war-time," and she urged that everything be done to preserve the unity of the English-speaking nations.

must very definitely instruct our people in the history of our race; in the Anglo-Saxon ideal, and in all that is symbolized in our Color Standard. Moreover, these women felt the need of giving to our people the imperial outlook and all that it stands for. To this end, the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire has not only been well established in Canada, but has extended its operations until it includes Australia, Bermuda, New Zealand, Newfoundland and the Bahamas.

In a word, it has become from a small Chapter of Canadian city women, one of the most powerful, impressive and prosperous organizations in the British Empire.

Madame President, on behalf of the officers and members of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, I salute you.

And what about the other native-born organization? It has come up from a small Institute of country women to be the largest single organization of women in the world, embracing in Canada alone approximately one hundred thousand members.

Like many other good things, both these organizations had their inception in the Province of Ontario. A Westerner has been aptly defined as "a person who does not believe in Ottawa." Sometimes here in the West, when we would be inordinately impudent we say that after a while we will get nothing from the East but the sun-shine. But as I said, this is when we are impudent. For all time, we who are women, must acknowledge with gratitude that both these organizations came from the East. For our part, ah well! we intend to give them quite a lift out here on the hither side of the Great Lakes.

ed for lack of food supplies, certain members of the Canadian Women's Institutes were called upon to organize a branch in Great Britain in order that both the civilian populace and armies might be fed—that the food production might be vastly increased and steadily maintained. The women of the British Isles were not only left at home in charge of the stuff, but charged with the duty of getting the stuff together.

And so the rural movement which started so modestly in a little village near Hamilton, Ontario, spread to Great Britain where, at present they have over one thousand branches.

In Canada each Provincial Institute has its headquarters at the capital building, it being a branch of the Department of Agriculture. The Canadian Federal body was organized at Winnipeg in February, 1919. In Great Britain the headquarters are at Westminster, Lady Denman being the President.

Madame President and members of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, I am not telling you these things of the Institutes in a boastful spirit, (indeed, in belonging to both the I.O.D.E. and the Women's Institutes, I feel myself doubly fortunate in this behalf) but I am inviting you to consider with me the duty of these two largest organizations of women in the Dominion and to decide upon what share they must have not only in the destiny of the British Empire but in the maintenance of the peace of the world.

The motto of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire is "One Flag, One Throne, One Empire," while the Institutes claim a shorter but no less significant one—"For Home and Country."

In his dreams that night he rode his roan horse through thousands of young women packed in an immense corral, seeking in vain to cut out the girl who could meet Harrigan's requirements. Perched on the top corral rail was a fat, middle-aged woman, shrieking poetical directions to the girls. And not one of the bunch would suit. In the distance he could hear Cory sawing wood.

Harrigan was snoring in his sleep.

CHAPTER FOUR.

THE CUPID EXCHANGE.

TWO weeks later the Cupid Exchange, alias Mollie Aiken, walked along Hastings street, Vancouver. Once she halted her westward progress to turn into a confectionery store, there to exchange a dime for candies and a few words with the salesgirl.

"How's business, Mollie?" asked she of the sweetshop.

"Poor to worse, Bessie. I'm barely making enough to pay for the ads. If it doesn't improve I may have to go back to work. I'm going to the post-office now to see if there's any fish in the net. I'd like to get hold of some big fish, if only to see if I could play it."

"For yourself, Mollie?" tantalized the clerk.

"No, for you, dear," flashed back Mollie as she took leave of her friend and confidante.

At the post-office Box X448 yielded its treasure of four letters, including one bearing postmarks denoting it had travelled from Khakala to Soda Creek, from Soda Creek to Ashcroft, and from Ashcroft to Vancouver. Miss Aiken placed the letters in her purse and walked out to catch a car bound for Grandview, where she had her home and the Cupid Exchange its headquarters—the home in a cheerful front bedroom and the headquarters in a cupboard (where her typewriter reposed) and a trunk (where her correspondence lay secure under lock and key).

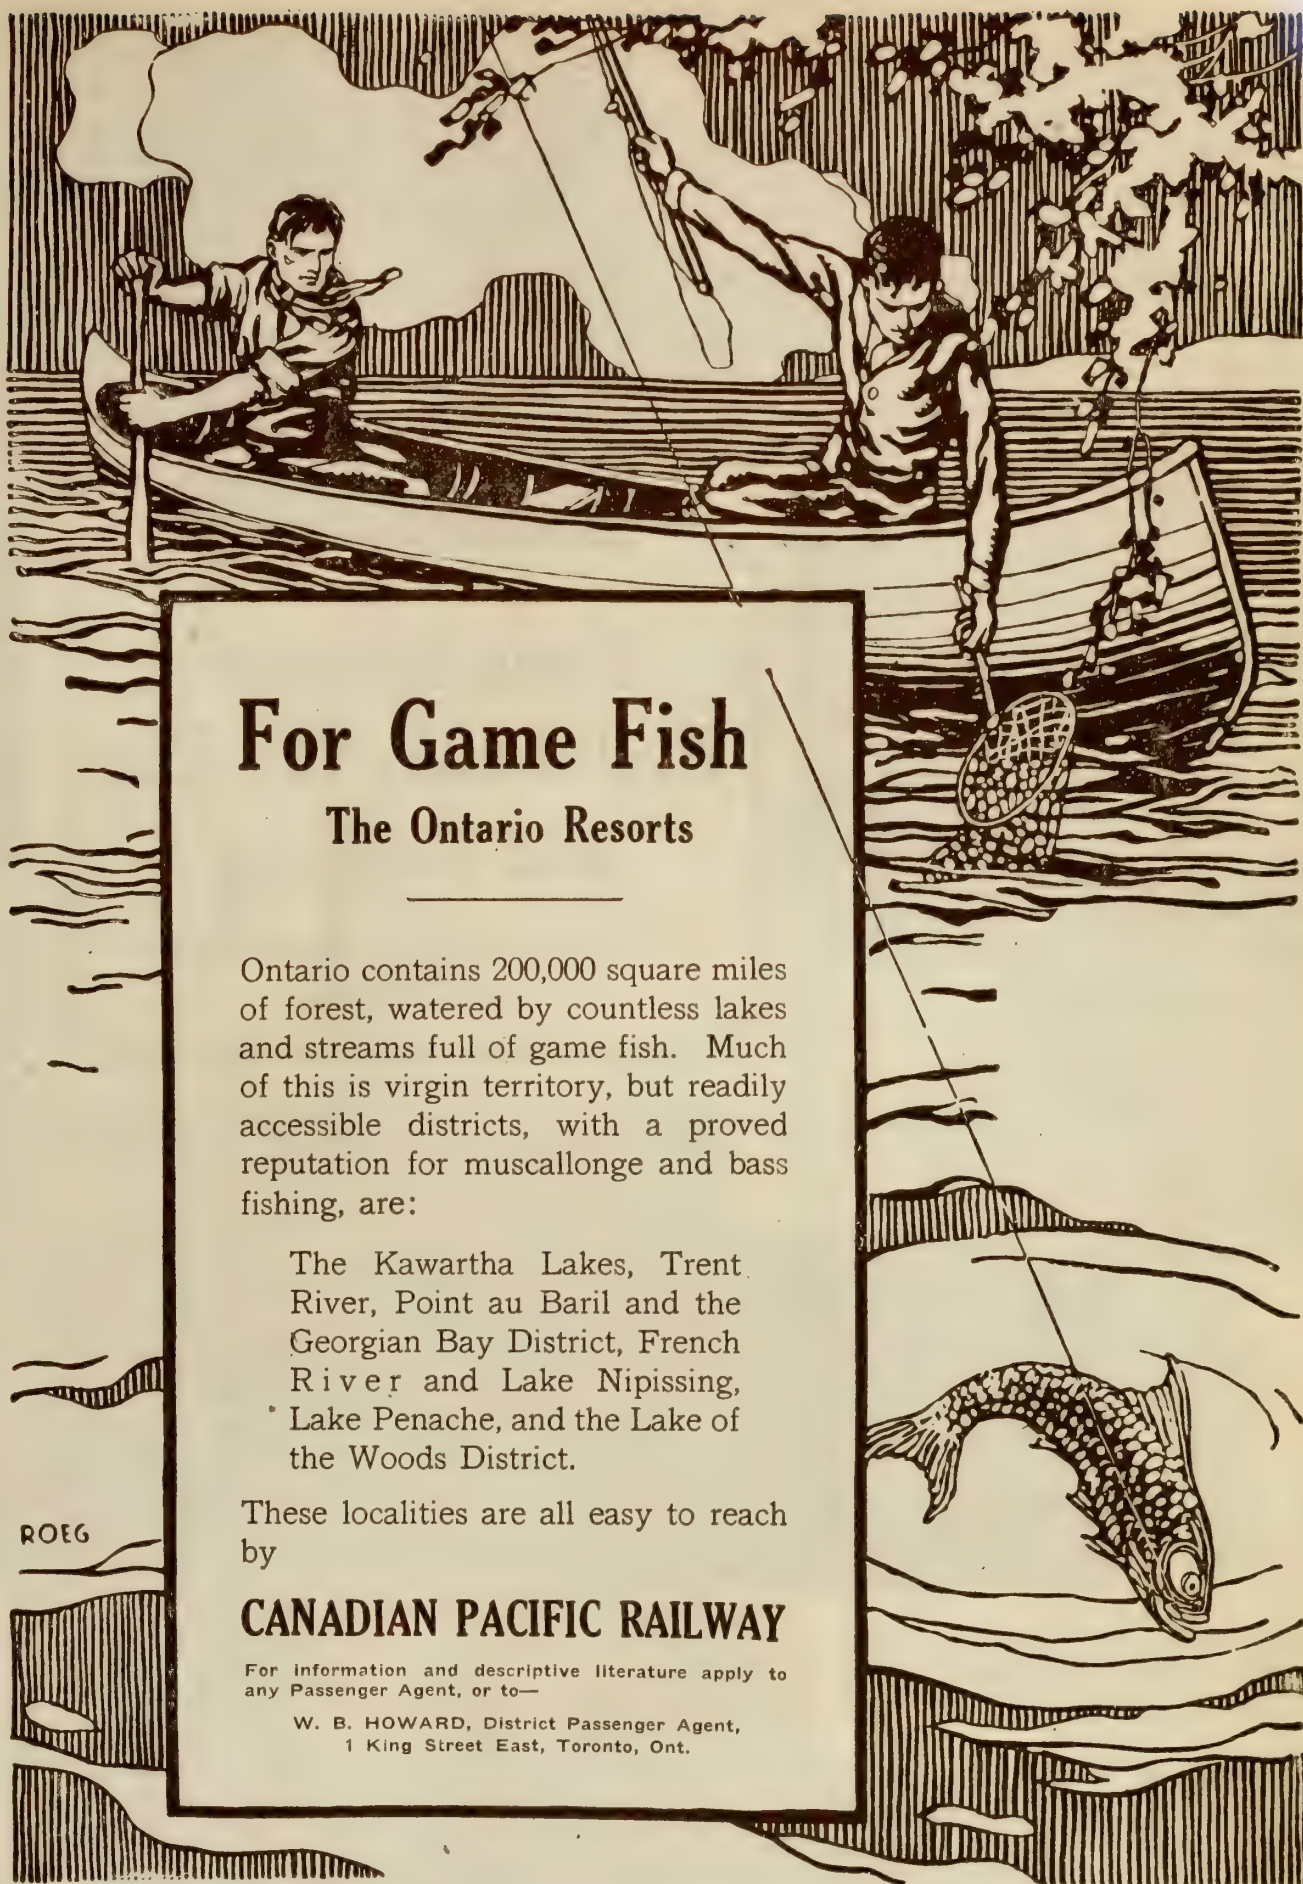

After supper, in the privacy of her bedroom-office, Mollie Aiken opened her letters. Two were evidently from adolescents and yielded nothing better than self-addressed envelopes and requests for matrimonial data. The third rejoiced Mollie's heart; it contained the dollar introduction fee so eagerly desired. The Cupid Exchange had a few simple rules for these introductions, rules based on the common-sense reasoning that the smaller the chance of meeting between the parties immediately concerned, the smaller the chance of trouble for the Cupid Exchange, and the greater the revenue for that same institution. For practical Miss Aiken never gave a correspondent the address of another; all letters had to be forwarded through Cupid Exchange headquarters (fee, ten cents, to defray postage and incidental expenses). Mollie reasoned that four or five letters would be exchanged before the correspondents gave each other their correct names, or tired of the game. In either case their amatory amusement would have enriched the Cupid Exchange by a round three dollars.

Unfortunately for the enterprising proprietor and manager, the preponderance of young ladies among the clientele meant that much of the correspondence yielded a revenue on incoming letters only. And this department of the business gave Miss Aiken most of her work for, lacking men, Mollie stepped into the breach, or the breeches, if you like, and became Charlie McL. to Daisy, Fred F. to the Rose of Kelowna, the Baseball Pitcher to Katie, Sober Working Man to Mother of Three—a demure miss who hoped to enter High School next year—Sam to Miss C. E. F., and so on.

Mollie had a lively imagination, and her letters were really masterpieces, and managed to hold the interest of the other party for a considerable time. She maintained, and rightly, that she gave them more than a dime's worth in each letter, even if it took her only five minutes to pound it out on the typewriter and file the carbon copy for future reference. For Miss Aiken was methodical, careful and prudent, if not scrupulously honest. But then she needed the money.

"Ashcroft—yes, that's somewhere on the C.P.R.," she mused as she

For Game Fish

The Ontario Resorts

Ontario contains 200,000 square miles of forest, watered by countless lakes and streams full of game fish. Much of this is virgin territory, but readily accessible districts, with a proved reputation for muscallonge and bass fishing, are:

The Kawartha Lakes, Trent River, Point au Baril and the Georgian Bay District, French River and Lake Nipissing, Lake Penache, and the Lake of the Woods District.

These localities are all easy to reach by picked up the last letter, "Soda Creek must be north of that—um—five days north by the postmark; Khakala—funny name, that—another five days away. How's Father Christmas and all the folks at the North Pole, little letter? Let's see what you've got to say anyway."

In another moment she was acquainting herself with the contents of Frank Hayes' letter. Mollie read it through once, then again, and yet a third time before making any comment. Then she murmured very softly:

"The big fish! A whale of a big fish!"

Then she read the last paragraph over again:

"No money whatever will be paid to any person until the young lady reaches Soda Creek. That is final, and I would strongly advise that you read that statement over and over until you firmly believe it."

"But he's no fool, or if he is his friendly secretary stands between him and this matrimonial shark. Oh, how I need that hundred."

FOR the next hour Miss Aiken was busy absorbing knowledge with the help of a C.P.R. timetable, a tape measure and the house telephone. The timetable showed her that Ashcroft was on the main line of the C.P.R. She finally discovered Soda Creek, a little circle near the top of the map. With her tape measure she made it one and three-eighths inches from Ashcroft, or, multiplied by the scale, 175 miles, which was within a few miles of the actual distance. Khakala she could not locate—"probably," she said, "it's one of those boom real estate towns that's sprung up since they made this map."

Finally the Cupid Exchange hit upon a happy expedient. Going downstairs to the house telephone, Miss Aiken called up the post office. In dulcet tones she told the clerk that she wished to send a parcel to Khakala—what was the rate, please?

"Twelve cents per pound straight. You see it's on a hundred mile stage route," explained the clerk. "Anything else I could find out for you?" It was not a busy hour at the post office, and the voice sounded really nice.

"Oh, please. If you could tell me just where Khakala is. I know it's near Soda Creek, and I think it's north. If you had a map you could tell, couldn't you?"

"Certainly, oh certainly, Miss—" "Bloomfield," fibbed Mollie promptly.

"I'll find out for you in just a minute, Miss Bloomfield. You just hang on to the 'phone, will you?"

As if Mollie wasn't doing that already. Soon the clerk returned.

"Hello."
"Yes."
"Miss Bloomfield?"
"Yes."

"Khakala is forty-seven miles south east of Soda Creek. Mail service twice a month. The postmaster is G. Laflamme. I think that's all the information we have in this office, Miss Bloomfield."

"Thank you ever so much for your trouble."

"No trouble at all, Miss Bloomfield, no trouble—Aw, shucks, she's hung up."

When Mollie started to classify Harrigan, according to the regular Cupid Exchange System, she discovered that the amanuensis F. H. had not devoted much time to describing his employer and friend. The main idea, apparently, was that Harrigan wanted a wife, not that a wife wanted Harrigan.

"But somebody's got to take him, for I need that hundred," Miss Aiken repeated to herself for the tenth time. "Saturday I start advertising for a future Mrs. Harrigan. Meanwhile we'll write him a cordial letter, just to let him see that the Cupid Exchange is right on the job. And we'll ask him a few questions, too. And," she nodded her head sagely, "we'll be very, very wise with this big fish. Not a word about the dollar introduction fee. And we'll be wise with ourselves, too. To-morrow we will find out if that's so about Account H842, Bank of British North America, Ashcroft. If my Dun and Bradstreet say that's so, I'll take the rest for granted—for the present."

The Summer Frock Comes into Its Own

8881—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8876—Ladies' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 38 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 7¼ yards 28-inch challis—1¼ yard 40-inch white organdy—2½ yards narrow velvet ribbon—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The month of May is apt to cut short all our sentimentalizing about it by presenting us with a few chilly days which are as unexpected as they are disconcerting. One simply refuses to go back to the heavier garments of March, and yet the airy frocks of Summer seem absurdly unsubstantial. A most satisfactory solution to the problem is a frock of printed challis. This fabric is as light in weight as the thinnest of Summer materials, but it attains an added warmth by being made of wool. As for its charming prettiness, the frock at the right provides conclusive evidence. The blouse, in addition to the becoming surplice closing, has a large white organdy collar, and cuffs of the same material finish the short set-in sleeves. Over a straight-line skirt, there is a gathered tunic, and organdy frills, such as those which edge the collar and cuffs, are used in double rows down each side of the overskirt. The sash is a narrow velvet ribbon which falls into a cascade of loops at the side.

Blouse 8846
Skirt 8295

Dress 8834

8846—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8295—Ladies' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 4¼ yards 40-inch dotted organdy—2½ yards plain organdy—2½ yards fillet lace—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Amid the general renaissance of textiles which is characteristic of 1920 fashions, it is gratifying to note that the humbler materials have not been forgotten. The lavish gorgeousness of brocades, the dashing gaiety of the sports silks, have not been able to eclipse from view the stuffs that belong peculiarly to Summer—the voiles, ginghams, and organdies.

In the latter especially there are some noteworthy innovations. Organdy is now to be had in all the delicate pastel shades, and very often it is sprinkled with large dots in white, black and white, or contrasting colors. What effective use can be made of this material is evinced by this charming model. Both the bodice and the tucked tunic are of dotted organdy, while the underskirt is of plain organdy. The vest which matches the underskirt in fabric and the tunic in tucking, has a U-shaped neck which will be found very becoming. Long bands of fillet lace outline the neck and vest, and appear again on the three-quarter sleeves, and a narrow ribbon sash slips under the lace and ties at the side in a bow with long ends. This dress is illustrated again on the page.

bow. The skirt is gathered, and has a series of trimming-bands set at intervals along its length. These bands are a good excuse for tassels, and since the latter are one of the smartest forms of trimming, it is well to avail oneself of the opportunity offered.

8846—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8295—Ladies' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 6¾ yards 36-inch voile—3½ yards grosgrain ribbon—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. One of the most pleasing versions of the perennial voile frock has a becoming square-necked blouse, joined to a skirt and full gathered tunic by a shirred girdle of the same material. Horizontal tucks appear on the vest and tunics and embroidery does the rest. A grosgrain ribbon sash ties at the side-front.

8860—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about 1¾ yard. Size 36 requires 3¾ yards 40-inch Georgette crêpe—15½ yards grosgrain ribbon for trimming-bands—2½ yards wide ribbon for sash. All the charm of this Georgette crêpe frock is in its grace of line and softness of texture. The round-necked blouse has vertical tucks at each side and kimono sleeves that reach just below the elbow. Bands of grosgrain ribbon make an interesting decoration on blouse and skirt, and a touch of embroidery is carried out in design 12561.

Now is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots

There is no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back, if it fails to remove freckles.—Adv.

The Songs Mother Used To Sing

Good songs, more especially the old familiar ones, will never die. How often we find ourselves carried back through the years to happy childhood by the strains of some never-to-be-forgotten melody. Every home in the land should have a book of these old songs, that the children might learn to sing the ballads so popular with their parents and grandparents years ago.

Canada's Song Book

Contains a splendid selection of representative National Airs, Hymns, Rounds, Glees, Ballads, etc. Arranged with music for class singing in one or two parts.

You should get this book. By a special arrangement with the publishers, we are enabled to offer this book FREE to our new or renewing subscribers to the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

8772—Child's One-piece Dress. Designed for 1 to 4 years. Size 4 requires 2½ yards 36-inch figured voile—2½ yards grosgrain ribbon. Figured voile in an attractive flowered pattern makes this rippling frock. Plaited frills of unpatterned voile are sure to delight a little girl's heart, and the grosgrain ribbon sash will disarm the most determined fastidiousness. Design 12567 is suggested as a guide for the large scallops.

8845—Girls' and Juniors' Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 6 requires 2½ yards 32-inch plaid gingham—¼ yard 40-inch white organdy for plaiting and girdle. Plaid gingham is a material particularly devoted to children, and when it is used in such a frock as this, the result is certain to be all that one expects. Plaited frills form the trimming on the neck-line, turn-back cuffs, and pockets.

Frocks and Blouses Share the Lovely Materials of the Season

8857—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $4\frac{1}{8}$  yards 32-inch check gingham— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard 40-inch white organdy for collar and cuffs. The glorification of Scotch gingham is complete, when it can be used to fashion a frock of such unquestioned charm. The collar is of white organdy, bordered with a band of the gingham, and a similar effect is obtained on the cuffs. A satin ribbon and a leather belt are the only accessories.

8838—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 36 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{7}{8}$  yards 32-inch plaid gingham— $\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch white lawn for vest, collar, and cuffs. A frock of uncompromisingly straight lines is developed in plaid gingham with a vest, long shawl collar, and interesting cuffs of white lawn embroidered in design 12559. Large patch pockets are convenient details, and a leather belt gives an air of trimness. A ruffle of Valenciennes lace edges the collar.

8758—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch poplin— $\frac{5}{8}$  yard 32-inch plaid gingham for trimming. Gingham has become so popular this season, that even where it does not make the entire dress, it is frequently used, as here, for collar, cuffs, and pockets. The frock itself is of poplin, embroidered at the neck in design 12509, and girded round with a belt of patent leather.

8685—Ladies' Slip-on Kimono Blouse. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Size 36 requires  $2\frac{1}{8}$  yards 36-inch crêpe de Chine. This simple crêpe de Chine blouse achieves distinction by the use of embroidery in design 12570. Stitching outlines yoke and sleeves, while a more elaborate design brightens the lower edge of the bodice, which ends in a wide sash.

8834—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires 4 yards 32-inch gingham—1 yard 36-inch white handkerchief linen for collar, vest, and cuffs— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. A simply cut frock of check gingham achieves contrast by the use of white handkerchief linen for vest, oval collar, and cuffs upon which a braided design carried out in 11290 serves for further emphasis. A bias band of gingham makes the belt, and slit pockets are both smart and practical.

on the complexion for I never heard of anyone using it. Do not let me into the secret! What result would you hope for from its application? I have heard of people eating yeast for indigestion, but personally I would much rather have the indigestion if I were given a chance. But mixed with milk for the complexion is a new idea to me. If I knew what defect you hoped to remedy by its use, I might suggest a substitute, but, dear all, you have left me in the dark.

D. G. R. It is quite likely that the preparation you ask about may be obtained in Winnipeg, now, as I understand the toilet goods made by this specialist are finding favor all over the Dominion and are being shipped far and wide from Toronto, where they are made. However, I shall only be too glad to give you the name of the rose pink bottle and tell you where it may be procured. I have found it excellent not only for the hands, but sometimes for the face, especially in the warm weather when a cold cream seems almost too heavy to use.

MRS. W. M.—There is no preparation that I could especially recommend for the matter you describe, unless it would be cocoa-butter which, if rubbed in each night before retiring, persistently, will have the effect of filling out the spot on which it is applied. You probably have heard of its value—it is often successful in removing scars left by cuts in the skin. The only remedy for the hip is exercise, or electric treatment. As you live in a small town, which probably does not contain a "beauty specialist," you are not in a position to take electric treatments, but you might try the exercise of standing erect and bending over to touch your toes with the tips of your fingers half a dozen times each day. Another good exercise for your complaint is to lie flat on the back with the hands at the sides and raise your two feet in the air and back in an endeavor to touch the floor behind your head. You will be surprised how easy this exercise, which seems so difficult at first, becomes after a few attempts.

PRIZE LETTER

"The Woodpecker," by Mary E. Jackson, age 11, Malton, Ontario.

THERE are nine species of woodpeckers in Ontario. The best known are the Hairy, Downy, Sapsucker, Red-headed and Golden-winged.

Both Hairy and Downy are very good carpenters and surely we have all heard the long rat-a-tat-tat of these two busy little workers. Some think that this is a signal to the animals that danger is near—but, it is only the woodpeckers getting their meal of grubs and insects.

These cousins are very much alike. Both are dressed in black and white, with a scarlet patch on the back of the neck. Hairy, however, is nine inches long, and has white feathers on the outside of his tail, while Downy is six inches long and has black and white tail-feathers.

The Golden-winged woodpecker has an ashy gray crest, with a scarlet band on the back of its neck. Its tail-feathers are yellow, tipped with black. This bird is often found on the ground destroying vast quantities of ants.

The head, neck and breast of the Red-headed woodpecker are of a deep 8934—Girls' and Juniors' Blouse. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires  $1\frac{5}{8}$  yard 36-inch voile—5 yards edging or plaiting for trimming. Very convenient are these little blouses to be worn with separate gathered or plaited skirts.

8915—Child's Rompers. Designed for 1 to 4 years. Size 4 requires  $1\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch kindergarten cloth. For the funny little fowl that seems to be feeding on the yoke, design 12362 is used. The embroidery is worked out in colored cross-stitch.

8900—Child's Rompers. Designed for 1 to 4 years. Size 4 requires  $1\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch percale— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard 36-inch white voile for collar and cuffs. A cunning feature of these rompers is the fichu-like collar that crosses in front and buttons onto the rompers.

8903—Boys' Suit. Designed for 2 to 6 years. Size 4 requires  $2\frac{3}{4}$  yards 27-inch rep— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard 32-inch check gingham for collar and cuffs. Here is a smart little suit for the wee man that offers many possibilities of attractive contrast. Instead of the rep and gingham as illustrated, two shades of linen or kindergarten cloth could be used.

Charming Bathing Suits and Delightful Piazza Dresses

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

4715.00

NEXT to the joy of a well-planned vacation is that of a well-planned wardrobe to go with it; not too much and not too little, and just the right things for the prospective vacation, whatever its nature. It was this we were thinking, when a voice over the telephone announced: "We're going to have a mannequin parade of piazza dresses and bathing suits," and asked if we didn't want to come to see it. Of course we did, and of course we went, and while it may be all very well for the fashion romancer to sing of the bathing suits and piazza dresses they are making in far-away Paris, unless we are very much mistaken, what the "Journal" readers want to hear about are the things they can buy and wear and not merely read about. So, what we shall write about to-day, are things that can be procured in Canadian shops—very likely the shops in your very own town.

Piazza dresses used to be porch dresses, and if you are athletically inclined, you call them sport dresses and play tennis or croquet in them; or, if you happen to be the careful housewife, so practical are they that you may wear them to market. Concerning them, one may well ask: What's in a name?

Because cartridge cloth is so new, and has been diverted from its gruesome mission to one of peace and feminine adornment, we shall give it the place of honor, mentioning it first. As you know—or perhaps you don't happen to know—when the armistice was signed, the different warring countries had great quantities of war materials on hand and among them was an abundance of cloth used in the making of cartridges. What to do with it was a question. Someone tried an experiment and the next thing we heard, the manufacturers were making it up into blouses and dresses, and while we sat in a comfy arm chair watching the mannequins meandering up and down the promenade, along came one wearing a pretty pale blue cartridge cloth frock with a cross-tucked white silk vest that extended below the belt like a diminutive tea apron and a ruffle of the blue around the neck and down the front. Cartridge cloth is all silk and has a surface finish like ratine, a weave, by the way, that is very fashionable this summer. Picture yourself, Little Miss Canada, sauntering up and down the promenade on a summer's day, in such a frock, wearing a white fibre sport hat embroidered with blue wool and a cheery-looking sunshade with a Persian centre and a black and white border.

A WHITE English gabardine dress with organdy girdle looked as cool and refreshing as an ice cream cone, and hardly less so was a pink stripe pique with white pique trimmings, simply made with straight lines, a tuck from the shoulder on either side of the front, elbow sleeves and a belt that could be raised or lowered to suit the figure wearing it.

Of more pretentious design was a Japanese foulard with blue coin spot and another in pink pongee made like a coat dress. These are but a few of the dainty piazza frocks shown, for we must hasten on to the bathing suits, which these bright, warm days remind us will soon be required.

Bathing suits—or do you prefer to call them beach suits?—have risen to great importance in the vacation wardrobe, if Muskoka, the St. Lawrence or any place where there is water, be one's objective. As a mermaid it is important that one should be picturesque. The vogue of things knitted has somewhat diverted attention from fancy silk and practical serges to the knitted bathing suits, than which there is nothing much more convenient. The most popular type is a tunic with knickers attached below the waist, and is really a one-piece suit. They are made in almost every color from black to bright rose, but popular colors are black, navy and emerald, with striped border, or perhaps a binding such as two seen in the parade. There were two alike save for the color; one was black and the other emerald, and each had a binding of white around the bottom of the tunic, around the neck and abbreviated sleeves. They were slashed at the sides and strapped with self color, and were constructed on the step-in principle and buttoned on the shoulder.

There were others of taffeta—what

THE SUMMER GIRL

a ubiquitous material this is getting to be; one finds it everywhere, bathing suits, blouses, frocks, sunshades, hats, etc. A navy blue taffeta tunic with a cluster of roses painted on the body and repeated on the side of the tunic—we almost gasped at the boldness of the idea of putting hand painting on a bathing suit, but on closer investigation found that they had been cut out of silk and appliqued on.

And ruffles! The organdie frock ruffled to within an inch of its life has nothing on some of these bathing suits. A regular step-in combination and never mind the tunic (quite all right and modest we assure you), was ruffled from knee to shoulders at intervals of five or six inches—you know those quaint Victorian ruffles frayed at the edges and stitched through the centre. It gathered in at the knees with elastic shirrings, and again at the waist, where ended two rows of small coral buttons that suggested it might be unbuttoned to the waist when one wanted to emerge from it. Besides the shoulder piece, there was an under-arm shield with a band around the arm, so cut as to leave a diamond-shaped opening between it and the silk on the shoulder. This style of sleeve seemed to be quite a favorite with the designer of these bathing suits and offered the only hope there was of concealing vaccination marks.

DAUNTLESS as a "painted ship upon a painted ocean" was an emerald green shot satin, made very much after the same fashion, only with distended sides and inset pockets which were edged with prim little pleatings. Then back to blue, for fashion seems to have contracted an absorbing fit of blues; we find one ruffled and sashed with Roman striped silk and another of English lustre with rows of American Beauty satin ribbon around the bottom of the tunic and a narrow patent leather belt encircling the waist. Surely those who go down to the sea—not in ships, but in bathing suits—this summer, will present a fascinating picture.

One sees some very fantastic bathing caps and hats made of rubber in all the colors of the rainbow, but something close-fitting, and if possible, with a visor or brim to shade the eyes, is much more apt to appeal to the Canadian, and of these there is ample choice, wherever bathing accessories are to be found.

And almost as interesting as the bathing suits, are the sunshades one is sure to see on the beach during the holiday season. It is quite a long time since we have had really novel sunshades. For the past few years we have had to content ourselves with colored silk umbrellas, equally at home in rain or shine. But this year marks a return of the glorified sunshade in a diversity of styles. One we saw at the races the other day, was a regular Japanese design, and the stubby end is quite a feature to be reckoned with when selecting your sunshade.

And speaking of sunshades, brings us very close to the matter of hats, which this year are so different, that we feel they are worthy of further comment, although we have discussed them in previous issues. To think of fashion discarding all traditions of her trade and offering us fabric hats for summer is certainly a departure. One of the newest things we have seen is organdie. Accompanying a canary colored, orchid trimmed frock was a soft brimmed sailor-shape of canary organdie, also orchid trimmed. For sports wear there are little taffeta shapes with brims that roll up or down at will, with perhaps a few rows of fancy straw, their only trimming. Shirring and hemstitching as well as pleatings, have their place on these chic little hats that come out as fresh as ever after being packed away tightly among one's belongings in trunk or bag, a quality that recommends them very highly to her who would a-travelling go.

Closely clipped chrysanthemum straw is having quite a vogue for sports wear. It is especially pretty in white and sand, and by the way, white sport hats, whether of straw or fabric, are predicted for midsummer favorites.

crimson. He feeds on insects, and likes ripe cherries.

The Sapsucker has a red cap and bib, with a yellow breast. He gets his name from his habit of boring holes in trees and drinking the sap. He does this when it is too early to find grubs. Very often the insects are attracted to the sweet sap, and thus he finds food more easily.

Woodpeckers are very useful to farmers, because they destroy the insects and grubs that live in orchard trees. The Hairy and the Downy stay with us all year, but the Sapsucker is here only in summer. No woodpecker seen in winter should be destroyed.

THE FIRE BIRD.

BY ETHEL BAIN.

THE sun blazed down on the dusty streets of the city. People scarcely lingered as with lagging footsteps they dragged along to the cool retreat of house or doorway.

Across the unshaded windows of the bird store crawled lazy flies, the gold fish in their glass bowls swam round and round in endless circles, the rabbits in their wire cage nibbled at a faded cabbage leaf whilst two sleepy Pomeranian puppies curled themselves up into soft silky balls of black fur. The water snake glided in and out among the weeds in its glass house and in a large cage a family of tiny marmosets kept up an endless chatter.

In the centre of the window stood a gilded cage and in the cage a bird hopped restlessly from perch to perch, its bright eyes watching all that passed. From time to time it paused and uttered a plaintive whistle and seemed to listen for a reply. When none came it started hopping backwards and forwards again. Head, throat and upper part of its back shone a glossy black. White markings stood out sharply on the black wings, whilst black tail quills but intensified the yellow color of the rest of the tail feathers. Everywhere else it was a vivid orange and as the sun poured down on to it, the bird looked as if it was bathed in fire.

"Ain't he a beauty?" said one half clothed urchin to another munching a rosy cheeked apple, as they stopped outside the store.

"He sure is," replied the other between mouthfuls of juicy fruit.

"Guess he'd cost a lot to buy."

"Let's ask," suggested the apple eater.

So into the store they went, their bare feet making no sound on the wooden floor. Down past the monkey cage they wandered, past the sleepy parrot on its stand, pausing a moment to watch the water snails as they slowly crawled up the glass sides of their prison, until they came to the storekeeper dozing in his chair in the mid-day heat.

"Say, Mister."

The man jumped and stared at the intruders. "What y'want?"

"How much is that there bird in the window, Mister, the one in the gold cage?" asked the older boy, pointing backwards with his grimy finger.

"Gold cage?" repeated the man. "There ain't no gold cage in my window. That's brass, boy, brass."

"But the bird, Mister?"

"Ten dollars m'lud."

The boys' faces showed dismay. They'd never owned ten dollars. One hundred cents was all they had ever saved. Without a word they turned away, slowly making their way to the door. The bird uttered its plaintive cry as they neared it and they stopped to get a closer view of the golden treasure. The apple eater looked at the core in his hand, then at the bird. Glancing hastily over his shoulder, he saw the store keeper nodding in his chair again, so he pushed the remains of the fruit through the bars of the cage. The bird began to peck at the morsel and glanced up at the boys as should do. My father is much too sharp eyed."

"Elaine Drayton!" he exclaimed, sitting up and facing her. "If you so much as mention paying me for the delightful visits I have had in Brentwood, I will drown you right in this brook—with one shoe off."

"I felt sure I should have done it in advance," she said, "But—"

"I simply refuse to discuss it," he said, reaching for the little silver purse she held and throwing it beyond her reach.

"I'm piqued at your lack of curiosity over the success of your treatment," she ventured later.

Instantly he turned and faced her. "He has spoken?" he asked.

"Last night."

"Then—" Dazedly he looked about to see if the sun had gone under a cloud, "You are to be congratulated."

"Suitable," she laughed. "But not usually put that way."

"I mean—he is, of course."

"That's as may be."

Slowly he turned from her, pulled his cap over his eyes and endeavored to put his world back into the very satisfactory place that it had occupied three short weeks ago. Reclining thus, it was impossible for him to see that the young woman behind him was regarding him with unsympathetic mischief in her eyes.

And she, on her part was musing on the probable method by which her grandmother would have proceeded "in her day."

"How," she wondered, "would one use their eyes on a young man who persisted in turning his back?"

Her final decision was that, for a modern and straightforward young woman, modern and straightforward speech was the best medium.

"Penny for your thoughts," she began.

He shook his head but did not turn. He would not let her see the misery in his eyes.

"Let's see," she murmured dreamily, addressing an inquisitive squirrel in a near-by alder. "Where were we when this conversation halted? Oh, yes, I was saying that Ronald Braithwaite had asked me to marry him."

Three pebbles were tossed into the limpid brown water, then:

"Well?" he asked.

"Well. I—I didn't accept him."

"WILL your mother be disappointed?" he asked after a short lapse of about two hours and a half.

"Mother? Oh, I'm sure you are solid there. I think she fell for the roses at the beginning. And the way you have ensnared Grandmother has been nothing short of a miracle!"

"How about your father? Is he home? Can I see him to-night?"

"Oh, that reminds me," Elaine Drayton exclaimed, searching everywhere for a silver purse that had certainly been in her belt when she started out. "Dad said at noon that he wished to see you before you leave to-night."

work and no one keeps account of how many you do. Many a jovial half-hour you manage to spend with two or three special friends clustered along the counter with a dozen or two gloves to be ticketed.

It is at these least busy times, that the customers get the poorest service. If a lady chances to be looking askance at the long silks you drop your needle and hasten to do her bidding, with a view to expanding your tally, but, if you espy down the counter a customer turning over the thirty-five-cent lises, you at once discover a refractory knot in your thread which demands all your attention, in the forlorn hope that one of the others will make the extra effort required to sell those thirty-five-cent lises. However, with the manager's resounding "Forward One!"—the derivation of which has never yet been revealed—you look up in surprise,—genuine surprise, you really had no idea that the manager had his eye on you—and rush forward, all eagerness to make yourself useful.

On the whole, though, the forenoons pass very pleasantly. Even

A mere touch will end it— So with corns

A spot on your hand is ended with a touch of soap. You don't cover it and keep it.

A touch of Blue-jay ends a corn, as easily and surely. Then why pare and coddle corns, and let them stay for years?

Millions of people nowadays end all corns in this way:

They drop on liquid Blue-jay or apply a Blue-jay plaster.

The ache stops. The toe from that moment is comfortable. And shortly the entire corn loosens and comes out.

The method was perfected in this world-famed laboratory. It is gentle, scientific, sure. It is now the recognized, the model way of dealing with a corn.

It means to those who know it a lifetime without corns.

It you let corns spoil happy hours, you should learn the folly of it. Try Blue-jay tonight. Your druggist sells it.

Lift Corns Out With Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns or calluses so they lift off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a touchy corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

Women! Keep a tiny bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.

though you cannot contrive to drop out of action with a box or two of gloves to be ticketed, you manage to introduce many little breaks in the monotonous routine of existence. There are always chocolates to be nibbled behind the manager's back, or under the friendly shelter of the counter, and there are many trips out of the department on errands of various purport, one of the favorites being a jaunt to the fifth floor, to return laden with a bag of apples or Chelsea buns, which you dexterously convert into the semblance of a dry-goods parcel and carry lightly under your arm, as you trip innocently past your manager, tossing it carelessly into the bunk from which it is snatched as soon as all suspicion has subsided.

Then, if your counter chances to be situated next the wall, so that one of the show galleries is suspended above your head, you have many a crisp and enlivening conversation with any window-trimming youth, who ventures to intrude himself upon your company in order to ascend to decorate the gallery above you. The ladder, upon which he reaches the gallery, has to be taken down while he is aloft, so, when he finally completes his work above and is prepared to descend, loud and long is the hammering and shouting he has to resort to, before you condescend to enter into a discussion with him, the length of which depends solely upon the meekness of the victim, as he leans from his lonely eyrie. You finally haul the ladder out from its resting place and permit him to descend to earth, upon which his meekness falls from him like a garment, and a nimble exchange of compliments ensues. The youth usually beats a retreat, vanquished either by the keenness of the feminine tongue or by a suspicious interest on the part of the manager.

THEN, of course, you have occasional calls from your various acquaintances. And you pull out a case of embroidered silks and turn them over animatedly, while the manager is glancing your way. Then, if your caller happens to be a man, the girls buzz around you after his departure to inquire who "your friend" is, where you met him, what he does, and if you see him often. You, of course, allow your departed acquaintance to lose nothing of sentimental interest in your replies to all these inquiries. Then if the same friend has been noticed poring over the same silk gloves too often and too long to escape the manager's eagle eye, the manager also visits you with a few inquiries, less sentimental but more to the point. In this respect, though, as in bringing refreshments into the department, he is often strangely unobservant. Sometimes you have lurking suspicions that the manager may be human, too.

There are so many of these little diversions that the morning is gone before you know it, and the girls who have been allotted the same hour for lunch stand, bag in hand, waiting for their gong to sound, and ready to bounce forth at its welcome note. Lunch hour is a joy forever. After ringing-out, you link up with a party of intimates and go out for lunch, after which you stroll out into the bustling mid-day street. You always stroll farther than you had intended and your walk frequently terminates in a chase round by the employees' entrance, through the ringing-in process and past Papa Collins and a scuffle through the store, dodging floor-walkers and bumping into customers.

If your party should decide to take lunch in the store as you frequently do, you always try to turn back again through the subway instead of passing on out with the crowd. You may never have succeeded in getting away with this performance, but you always make one try at it, at least. If you march boldly past Mr. Collins with innocence writ large upon your fair young face, you stand a slight chance of success, but, as sure as you attempt to slip stealthily along, keeping the time-clocks between yourself and the all-seeing eye, you no sooner reach the head of the subway stairs, than a resounding "SAY!" shakes the building to its very foundations. It is a volume of wrath and avenging justice that can be put into that monosyllable, and Mr. Collins' rendering of it is such as to give you pause, indeed. "You can't go back there!" he thunders. "Go out the RIGHT way!" And after getting rid of the canvasser at the door she came racing back with an expectant glow in her eyes, which died a pitiful death when she noted Bartholomew's unemotional workaday aspect.

Sophia pulled him away from his work a good many times that summer; and though he always thought he was going to the shows and amusement parks just to please his wife, who was a giddy young thing, and needed diversion, it was amazing what pocketfuls of dimes the merry-go-rounds and the loop-the-loops picked off him that season.

But he didn't dare go out in a boat alone with Sophia. He tried it once, and came near disgracing himself again. He decided the peculiar motion of the boat was to blame, and thereafter steadfastly ignored any hints of hers about the delights of rowing by moonlight.

Sophia just made him learn about baseball. The poor simp had never seen a game, and he felt himself a martyr of heroic dimensions the first Saturday she dragged him to the field. To leave his masterly portrayal of American life for anything so unintellectual, puerile and utterly futile as a ball game was a wicked waste of the power vouchsafed to him in trust for the enrichment of literature. But he liked little Sophia, and hated to hurt her feelings when she begged him to take her—and at bedtime on the second Saturday she discovered him at the kitchen sink, sheepishly concocting a gargle for his sore throat.

"It does seem a little strange, Sophia, when I think about it, that I never saw a ball game before. But I was always reading when I was a boy, or studying. If I ever got to frolicking around much there in the back yard where the Burnet kids play, my mother would call me in, 'to get my lesson.' And I liked to study. I really enjoyed it. It seemed a waste of time to be running and jumping about when I could be reading and learning things out of books. I never went to school at all till I started in the High School. I learned at home. And novels! Why I read thousands of them before I was ten years old—mostly pretty good ones, too. Even then, I had no patience with the really trashy stuff. Bulwer Lytton was my text book when I was eight; Earnest Maltravers my idol. And Macaulay's sonorous periods were a delight to me. I read his 'History of England' till at one time, actually, I believe I could have repeated the three volumes with but an occasional prompting. My mother didn't much like me to be with other boys, and I didn't care for it, either, and so, of course, they didn't. Even in the High School I sat at my desk and studied during the noon hour, and never appeared on the playgrounds. I thought that was such a sensible way of doing, and wondered how some of the boys who were really bright fellows could waste their time as they did.

"But maybe I was wrong," he went on, thoughtfully. "Maybe I ought to have been kicked out among them. I guess I'm queer. I don't seem to get on with people. Maybe it's keeping to myself that way and gobbling fiction all my youth that's queerer me. People just don't like me. I've tried to be nice to 'em, but they just don't like me, and it has hurt. Oh, it's hurt awfully sometimes, especially since mother died."

The big fellow gulped, and his shoulders heaved. Sophia's little hand went out involuntarily toward him, and Sophia's arms ached to creep around his neck, which she figured was just about the right height for her to reach comfortably.

"And since you've come, Sophia, you've been so friendly and nice, just as if I weren't different, and we've seemed to get on so well that—that it's been heavenly. I've been woefully afraid you'd quit. Oh, Sophia, if you feel it coming on that you can't stand me any more, just please tell me and I'll keep out of your way for a while till you get over it a little."

"Go to bed, big boy," said Sophia, with a curious throatiness in her voice. "I like you because you are you, and not a bit queer." She risked an affectionate pat on his shoulder, and then scurried off to her room.

IT was an amazing revelation to Bartholomew that the more he gadded about with Sophia to the haunts of the giddy, the more work he did and the better its quality became. He knew it was better, and he began to have less respect for the old stuff. And along in August one of his stories was published. Not all his satisfaction in this event was removed by his later discovery that the editor had mistaken the nature of Bartholomew's purpose in offering it, and had accepted it in a friendly way as an unpaid contribution.

Sophia was boiling when she read the letter. "The thieving hound!" she exploded; "as if you were aching for a chance to give away your splendid things! And that rotten, paltry, little pamphlet that's too cheap even to have a girl on the cover! Why, I'd sue him, Bartholomew. I'd have him arrested for stealing. That's what it is, just plain stealing. Just as if there weren't plenty of magazines that'd jump at a chance to get your stuff, if they only had some readers with education enough to tell literature from drivel."

"Well, Sophia, I guess it won't break me up to lose that one. I seem to have plenty more in stock." He glanced ruefully at the heap yielded by the piano box.

Sophia had assumed the task of sending out again the rejected manuscripts, and to-day she broached, in what she considered a skillful, roundabout way, a matter that had long lain next her heart.

"These are neatly typed, Bartholomew; very nice work, indeed. Who did them?"

"Oh, I had 'em done," uninterestingly.

"Naturally. Done here, were they?"

"Mostly."

Poor Sophia paled. "They—they're not all by one typist."

"No."

"Then you had—different ones here?"

He looked up. "What are you driving at, Sophia? I should say I did have different ones."

"Here, like us?" she persisted bravely, with pain in her eyes.

Then the big man rose, with the flaming face of a boy. "Sophia Bartle, shame on you!" he cried, and strode from the room.

But Sophia wasn't a bit ashamed.

"The big dear," she murmured happily. She was sure now.

HE was stiff with her for a day or two, but she never alluded to the subject again, and the charm of her presence soon won him back into the same easy comradeship.

One evening after supper he was lying loosely in a rocker, with closed eyes, letting a story seethe through his brain. Sophia was sitting across the table with a bit of mending in her hand, and the man in her eye.

"Bartholomew," said she; "did any girl ever tell you that you are a very beautiful young man?"

"No girl has," he repeated, opening his eyes. "I had begun to think the girls have as little judgment as the editors."

"Well, you are," said Sophia, with a little flush. "I'm telling you for your own good. It'll give you more confidence, maybe. A little more 'pep' wouldn't hurt you any, Bartholomew."

"One girl did say something like that," said he, reminiscently, "but she added an invidious comparison. She said: 'So is the Apollo Belvidere beautiful—and almost as human.'"

"One of those?" asked Sophia, indicating the bunch of formerly typed manuscripts.

"Yes."

"What became of her?"

"She quit in a huff because I told her I wanted the work copied, not edited. They seem to think they can improve on the paragraphing and the punctuation, and doubtless they can; but we've all a sneaking fondness for our own ideas, you know. I don't blame the poor things for quitting. I wasn't paying them much, and they disliked me. We couldn't understand each other. They looked at me sometimes as if I were a curious specimen of a newly-discovered race. Yet I wanted them to like me, and it hurt when they quit."

"Did you tell them so?"

Face to Face with Truth

DIMLY in her mirror she sees the truth—that youth is slipping by. To many a woman this revelation comes too late.

The preservation of health and beauty should be begun while youth, health, and beauty still are hers.

If past your twenties watch closely for Pyorrhea. Its effect upon the body is strangely like that of Age. It changes the contour of the lips, makes flaccid the tissues of the throat, and often degenerates and weakens the vital organs.

Pyorrhea begins with nothing more alarming than tender and bleeding gums, but it ends in toothlessness or ruined health. As the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of Pyorrhea germs which lodge in little pockets around them.

It is to these infecting germs that medical science has traced a host of ills—rheumatism, anaemia, nervous disorders and other serious ailments.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy—the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

"Of course not," opening his eyes. "I wasn't running after people to beg for the crumbs of their affection. I could see they didn't like me, and were uneasy with me and wanted to get away, so I just flinched back into my shell, no matter how much I wanted to come out, and told them to go."

"You told them to go?"

"Generally, yes. I could see they didn't want to stay and were going to quit, and that gets on my nerves, and I beat them to it."

"You're a funny, funny little boy —" She checked herself sharply, at the pained look in his eyes.

"There, what did I tell you. You feel it, too, Sophia, though you've pretended not. I'm queer, and I can't tell what it is. I can't help it."

"I can tell you, Bartholomew. You've never had your growing-up. You're just a learned little boy. And a mighty sweet boy at that," she added, blushing at her own boldness.

"Sophia," he returned gratefully, "you are like a lovely little mother. You always seem to understand and to care. You're the only one I ever could stay friendly with. You don't change my punctuation, either," he added, as an after-thought.

"It does not need changing, Bartholomew; it's perfect."

"Can anything so delightful really last, I wonder. When I wake in the morning I hold my breath till I can hear you in the kitchen."

He laid a big, white, muscular hand on her little brown one and patted hers caressingly. Perhaps it was a way he had had with his mother. There was a dreamy, tender note in his voice when he said: "It's so like it used to be with mamma." Sophia sighed.

One morning, after putting the roast in the oven, Sophia went in to her machine and found Bartholomew frowning over some bills. He looked so fierce she faltered in alarm. She'd tried so hard to keep everything down, but maybe he had expected them to be less. If he should scold she knew she couldn't stand it. It's bad enough, when you are dead in love with a man and serve his slightest whim with humble devotion for weeks, to have him pat your hand and say you remind him of mother. But if he should scold! She knew she'd go to pieces, and maybe he'd find out how gone she was on him, and that would be awful. She blushed at the very thought. She waited like a timid, affectionate child, craving praise and fearing a blow.

"When I told you, Sophia," he said, sternly, "that we had to be careful, I didn't mean that you were to do without clothes or go hatless and barefoot. This bill at Lewis' is only forty-four dollars. Now, how can a young woman with your—ah—exquisite figure dress herself on forty-four dollars a month?"

Sophia, with memories of the hall bedroom at 28 B Street, the fifteen-cent lunch and the precarious ten dollars which had made Saturday always a red-letter day, suspected irony.

"Oh, Bartholomew, I never mean to spend forty-four dollars every month. That will last for at least four months. I told you," she went on tearfully, in a desperate appeal for justice, "that—that I was short so many things, and would have to spend a lot at first. I think you might consider how little I had."

The graceful brown head was bowed, and the tears were starting down her cheeks. She dabbed them away inelegantly with the back of a little hand which had been white, and now was stained and roughened from drudging in his kitchen.

It was too much for Bartholomew. He swept her into his arms, and for a second held her clear off the floor, with her feet dangling ungracefully. But he set her down almost instantly and backed off.

"There, there, little girl; what do you think I am. A hog, a dog, a goat, a gorilla, a graceless hound? To let you come in here and make life a little heaven on earth for me, and then to kick about your buying a few clothes! Why, child, if you don't know how to spend more than forty-four dollars in four months, I've got an aunt can show you. I'm not so hard up as that, Sophia. In fact, I'm not hard up at all. I'm just naturally a little tight, that's all, and keep my income pretty well absorbed by investments. You're Mrs. Bartholomew Barrett, and you're the prettiest girl in the world. Now, you go down there and blow yourself. If you don't know how, Aunt Emma can help."

"I think I can do it, Bartholomew," she answered, faintly, with a twinkle in her eye. "I've always imagined I could if I ever had the chance."

It was remarkable how much prettier she had become all at once, just since Bartholomew had picked her up in that rough, impulsive way.

"By George, you are the prettiest girl in the world. I wasn't lying."

"Nonsense," she said, looking still prettier. "Don't try to fool me, Bartholomew. I know why you chose me. I looked all those photographs over. But," she continued, as if with a belated determination to do herself justice, "half of them weren't genuine—were pictures of movie actresses and stars. The bold things thought they could trap you with a star's picture into giving them an interview, when they hoped to be able to do the rest."

"Thank God, I did choose you!" was all he said, as he went back to his desk.

SUMMER slipped away, and September's school took the Burnet children out of the yard. Sophia missed them, and so, occasionally, did Bartholomew, who was now absorbed in composing a third novel. Before four o'clock in the afternoon, however, Sophia always had her bait out on the back steps in a tin cake box.

It was a happy summer for Sophia, mostly because she thought she saw her way clear to a much greater happiness. But Bartholomew continued as blind as the cop in a dry town. One day on the street she met a man for whom she had occasionally done extra work, a writer. He asked if she wanted to type a novel for him. She didn't want to, of course, and let it be known, with great secret satisfaction, that she was married and such humiliating necessities as seeking employment were long behind her.

That afternoon she pounded the typewriter furiously and constantly. Bartholomew finally noticed it.

"What's your rush to-day?"

"It's the last chapter. I'm trying to get done."

"I've finished fifteen chapters of 'The Height of Folly.' You can begin on it whenever you want."

"I—I've promised to do some other work, Bartholomew."

"What?" said he, jumping from his chair.

"I promised Mr. Hazel, over on Laurel Avenue, to type a novel for him."

Bartholomew went white, and drooped back into his chair with such a stricken face that she almost relented.

"I knew it," he mumbled wanly; "I knew it couldn't last." Then, looking at her beseechingly, "You're not going? You're not?"

"Oh, but I am. Mr. Hazel wants me, and I promised."

"You're married to me. You belong here."

She checked him with upraised hand. "The marriage was but a form to protect us from the tongues of gossip. The real contract was the typing of two novels, in return for your support and name. The novels are done, the contract performed. It is entirely optional with us now whether we continue the association. Mr. Hazel wants me, and I have promised."

"Tim Hazel!" he blazed. "I beat him once in debate at college. I'll beat him again with my fists. I'll tear his heart out—and feed it to the cat," he raged, horribly. "You go to Tim Hazel! You! You belong here. You'll stay here." He crushed her roughly against his breast. "Do you hear?" he shouted. "You'll stay here. I want you here."

"Why?" her voice rang out clear and sharp.

His jaw dropped, and he stared stupidly at her. Then a whimsical little grin crinkled his eyes.

"I guess it's because I love you, you darling, soft, little girly-mother of a wife. You outside, touts!"

He jumped. "Who's that on the porch?"

She held on tight. "You needn't be so scared," she murmured, plaintively. "I'm married to you. It's only the Burnet children, anyway, come for their cake. What was that you were saying, Bartholomew?"

you waste no time in carrying out his mandate.

Lunch hour passes all too quickly, the steady flow of afternoon trade begins, and you settle down with a will to accumulating all the sales possible on your tally-card for the day, for your daily sales must show up reasonably well, or you run a chance of being asked the reason why. The customers come thick and fast, nice, fat, old ladies who tell you all about their grandchildren while you are fitting them, simpering girls who show you their diamond ring, tired women with hot babies, bustling women who ask for your number in closing the sale, irascible women who ask why you do not carry a larger range of goods and upon being advised that you personally do not do the buying for the department also ask for your number and give you a menacing glance, flashy women who offer you tips, Salvation Army women who ask you if your soul is saved, tawdry women who ask for something inexpensive "for my maid" or for "use in the machine," real gentlewomen who buy something cheap without any apology, haughty women with thin, cold hands, genial women fitting out their growing daughters,—on they come, in endless stream and in endless variety.

You warm to your work as it goes on, scurrying up and down, pulling out everything that might be of interest, explaining and suggesting. If you are not well informed as to the merits and demerits of the goods you are selling, the more adroitness you must employ in order to convince your customer of your reliability and judgment.

YOU are thoroughly foot-sore and weary by four-thirty when preparations for closing commence, but you revive somewhat as the closing hour draws nearer. You tidy up the counter, fold the extra gloves away in their drawers, count up your tally and dispose as hastily as possible of the five-o'clock-rush of customers. Everyone is inquiring of everyone else, "What have you on?" which, being interpreted, is "What is the total amount of your sales for to-day?" and is a never failing source of interest, as your monthly bonus depends to a certain extent upon your sales.

It is just at this juncture that the carriers for the department come around with your fresh stock in their not altogether romantic carts, and you are never too busy to exchange a few jovial words with them as they trundle their chariots past.

With the five-o'clock gong, you snatch up the box-lids and jam them on and slam the ticket-stands down on their faces, and the luckless customer who ventures into your domain after this, receives scant courtesy.

Five-ten sounds, and you fling the dust-covers over the goods, jerk off your apron and stuff it into the bunk, breaking the point off your pencil as you do so. After considerable search you find your bag. It yields up a few left-over chocolates, which are divided up and eaten, and all line up for the five-fifteen bell with its sweet song of work ended.

You swarm out at its call. Everyone from the various circles is bumping into you and you are bumping into them, as everybody is trying to walk in parties of three or four with arms entwined. You know it cannot be done, but you always do it. You jostle on gaily, down the stairs and through the subway.

Or, if you happen to be out of luck, and some late-faring customer has coerced you as you were about to flee, you stay and go through the same old formula, while the rest of the girls call their sympathy to you as they fly. Then, when you finish, you wearily gather up your belongings and tramp through the great, almost deserted store.

Your day's work is over.

Six hours later, you will be winding up your unloved but indispensable alarm clock, and setting out your clothes so that you can jump into them at a moment's notice if necessary, and flinging up your window, and switching off your light, and—

Seven o'clock and your alarm clock reverberates through the sleepy halls—

By Anne Elizabeth Melvin

Once More—The Good Old
Summer Time

ONE hears a great deal about spring fever and its consequences, how it creeps insidiously into one's system creating a distaste for work and urging one to drop everything and revel in a grand orgy of idleness. But there is likewise the summer fever, less insistent, perhaps, but capable of working havoc in one's cosmic scheme. It is to a large extent a holiday time and from the beginning of July our friends in office, school, or ware-room are beginning to take the fortnight or more that is allotted them in which to rest from their labors. The yearly question arises: "Where shall I spend my vacation?" For some there is the fashionable hotel by lake or sea; others prefer the quietness of some sequestered farm where they may enjoy a respite from social demands and stiff collars; still others turn to the great out-of-doors to revel in the wildness of lake and wood, where they can paddle about in a canoe or boat or tempt the wary bass from its cool retreat. Well, it is every man to his fancy and what one would enjoy would bore another to extinction.

The kiddies are now much in evidence. When one is the proud possessor of six sons ranging from thirteen to two with the regularity of ladder rungs, one is prepared to speak as one having authority. I speak from the heights. It is mighty comfortable to think of them safely housed at school under the wise direction of some of those good men and women whose lives are given up to what must sometimes seem a thankless job. But it is also distinctly cheerful to hear their care-free voices about the house, to have them rushing in at unexpected moments for bits of string, old corks, tape-measures, the kitchen tray, one's garden trowel, and all the other accessories that seem to fill the play hours of the average boy. It is very sweet to have them tearing in, breathless and impatient, for a piece of bread and jam, their faces aglow with health and happiness. A hug of gratitude, a moist kiss, a cheery smile, and they are off again to their outdoor joys, and one turns to one's task with misty eyes and a heart full of thankfulness. What would the world be without them? What is a home without them? Can't you just imagine the desolation and loneliness of the quiet town of Hamelin, after the Pied Piper had by his magic flute led away the dancing, laughing children to the mountain fastnesses?

THEIR vacation is a serious matter. It is a recognized truth that no child is the same at the end of a long vacation as at the beginning. This is especially true of older children who are not under such constant supervision. They are freer from parental control; there is less restraint put upon them because it is their holiday; they are out more because it is summer. They make new friends; they exchange visits of greater or less duration with these young associates. They are out of one's sight a great deal, and in these days of freedom they are apt to run into dangers of which the average parent knows little and apparently cares less. There is the freedom of the summer resort, the wide range of the farm, the informality of motoring and picnicking in out of the way places. One can't be with them every minute, but one should keep a closer watch upon their actions. One must keep in touch with them and the best way of all is to be their confidante. Get their confidence. Make them feel assured of your interest. Induce them to tell you about their friends and their doings. If they happen to be out a little late, have them come to you and tell of the evening's happenings. Don't be too busy to lend a listening ear. Never be too absorbed to show a deep interest in their affairs no matter how trivial. The thought of Friend-Mother or Friend-Father has kept many a boy and girl straight. The thought that his day's outing is to be gone over in detail to an interested mother before he goes to bed at night will keep a boy straight and honest and clean when nothing else will. I try to be to my boys what my dear Mother was to me. "No matter how late we came home from a dance she was always awake to hear about our partners, the dresses, the music, and everything else that had made for us a thrilling evening. Much of the happiness of my childhood and youth was due to the fact that Mother shared in that joy. Young people were always welcome at the house and she enjoyed them as much as we did. She is still as young as any of us, and when I think of a very youthful-looking person who to-day welcomes her children's friends as her own and is herself the life of many a jolly party of young people, I make to myself a little prayer that the good Mother who has been spared to see her family grow up may live for many years to enjoy the companionship with which they surround her. After all, home is where the Mother is, and though one may have other abiding-places which claim most of one's time, the real home is the one sanctified by that sweet and pervading personality. God bless the Mothers—every one of them!

This month will see the closing of many schools. Thousands of boys and girls will rejoice in the freedom of a long, health-giving holiday and rest. But it is a time when parents should be very much awake and unusually watchful. Let us watch their associates, let us plan to be with them whenever possible. Ask their friends to visit them, for so we may study at closer range the influences that form so great a part of their impressionable young lives. Very often we may steer them clear of undesirable friendships that may, if unchecked, mar their lives. Good wholesome companionship means much at this time. A natural association between boys and girls is normal and good for all concerned, but let them be friends before everything else. Do not set the boy to thinking of any one girl as his "girl." Do not let the girls indulge in foolish romanticism that is going to deprive them of half of the fun of their lives by making them self-conscious and sex-conscious. There will be plenty of time for the consideration of that relationship a little later when pigtailed are a thing of the past and when "longs" have taken the place of knickers. Let them be boys and girls together, healthy normal children in whom is centred the future of our nation.

There never were as many opportunities for the boys of our country to earn good salaries as exist to-day, and with this possibility comes a great temptation to those young men who are chafing under school discipline to give up the grind and routine of the class-room for the broader fields that lie so temptingly before them. They forget that the choice which they now make must stand good for the rest of their lives—that if they once leave school to embark on some commercial enterprise, they will never return. It is very nice to feel one's own money jingling in one's pockets, to feel independent of the father's purse-strings, but if that same father is willing and able to keep his boy at school a year or so longer and further equip him for the battle of life, let him think twice before throwing aside such an opportunity for the more tempting but much more temporal advantages of a good position. The drudgery of school will not last forever—it is over all too soon, and the boy who sticks it out is much better equipped for the duties that will come later.

AND one's thoughts turn from the happy cared-for child to that great number of little ones who like Topsy, just "grow" without any assistance or interest from outside sources. To those whose horizon is not hemmed in by brick walls and

Sugar From the Douglas Fir

By FRANCIS DICKIE

THAT sugar would be found to be produced on the foliage of a tree such as the Douglas fir of British Columbia, a coniferous tree reaching great dimensions, and for many years a valuable producer of lumber and some of the tallest flag-poles in the world, would seem a most unbelievable thing. Yet, nevertheless, it is true as has been just recently brought to light by the research and investigation of Professor John Davidson, F.L.S., F.B.S.E., a well known botanist of British Columbia, the result of whose labors in observing the sugar fir are herewith set forth for the first time to the general reading public.

Yet, though the discovery has just recently been made, it is not a new thing for the Douglas fir to produce sugar. For centuries in certain districts of British Columbia the fir has been yielding sugar, which was gathered by the Indians, but which evidently escaped the attention of the early white explorers and missionaries, as I have been unable to find any mention of it after searching many chronicles of olden days.

The sugar by the fir produced is, too, of a very rare kind, producing a tri-saccharide of unique quality in greater abundance than any other plant as yet known to man. The following story of the sugar fir and how it comes to produce so strange a thing upon its foliage is herewith set down from scientific data gathered by Professor Davidson who travelled throughout the region where it grows, and spent some time in a thorough investigation of the habitat of the trees, the atmospheric conditions and other things which he found played a part in bringing about this strange phenomenon in the plant world.

The sugar producing fir is found chiefly in the dry belt of British Columbia, in the interior of British Columbia, between parallels 50 and 51, and longitude 121-122. It is also reported in the eastern portion of the State of Washington. As seen in the accompanying photograph of the fir branch, placed beside a foot rule to give some conception of dimensions, the sugar forms in irregular masses, and also in white flakes. The masses are from a quarter of an inch to two inches in diameter. The sugar is exceedingly sweet to the taste, giving a flavor like a very good quality of ordinary refined sugar. On first being taken into the mouth it goes momentarily into a sticky paste, which, quickly and entirely becomes dissolved.

The investigator, after much research, careful investigation and covering a good deal of country in the dry-belt, found that trees growing on northern and eastern slopes in this region were the chief bearers of sugar. Trees on the southern and western slope, where the trees were greatly exposed to the heat of the sun, and where the soil was much drier, did not generally yield sugar. Neither those in the dense fir forests of the coastal regions were found to bear sugar. The explanation of the sugar's appearance proved to be a phenomenon largely depending on atmospheric and soil conditions. The trees on these northern and eastern slopes were fairly well apart, so that a great portion of their leaves received sun. There was also a better air circulation than trees get in heavily-forested areas, and the ground could get warmth from the sun. Trees exposed to a good supply of sunlight gather on their leaves carbohydrates. Ordinarily, these are taken into the plant at night to supply tissue and storage cells. In the dry belt, however, an abnormal amount of carbohydrates was accumulated. At the same time the soil warmed by the sun increased the root activity so much that it was carried on into the night in this region, where the nights were warm and dry and very short.

As a result of the greatly heightened root pressure and the cessation of transpiration, the leaves became gorged with water. This water presently exuded out of the leaf tips. The water contained a certain portion of sugar, resulting from the conversion of starch into sugar. As the water emerged into the hot, dry night air existing in this dry-belt region, it quickly evaporated, and the sugar was left in drops at the leaf tips, where they hung singly, or fell to form the masses shown in the photograph. But the sugar by reason of its depending so largely on atmospheric conditions of a certain nature for its production, is not something that can be relied on to yield a yearly harvest. For in the hot season the occurrence of a few dull days enables the trees to use much of the excess sugar, or store it as starch as a food reserve. The cooling of the air also checks the activity of the sugar forming cells in the leaves, and also the roots become less active as the ground lessens in warmth.

Thus to-day, the Indians accept the sugar yield as something to take advantage of in the good years, but as something which they cannot look forward to with any degree of assurance, though they do get a good deal on the average. Analysis made both at the chemistry laboratories at Ottawa, Canada, and Washington, D.C., show the sugar to have a high degree of constancy of composition. The fact that it yields a pure and rare tri-saccharide, which was formerly only obtained from a shrub in Turk-estan and Persia, and that the fir sugar contains nearly fifty per cent. of this in its make-up, or more than any other plant as yet known to man, is of great interest. While the sugar will never be used as food by the white man, there is every possibility it may prove valuable for use in chemistry and medicine. These facts now remain to be brought to light as a result of this recent rare discovery.

smelly pavements the hot days of July and August are not the nightmare that they are to many who have to bake daily in small houses where the only breeze that blows is scented with the fetid odors of the street or the adjoining alley.

There are many organizations which plan to give a week or so to those poor children who would otherwise spend the hottest weeks amid the squalor and discomfort of surroundings that have become horribly familiar. Surely there is no more worthy object upon which we may expend a few dollars than in contributing to one of these societies.

An invention which has revolutionized July

Think how many new delights Prof. Anderson gave summer when he invented Puffed Grains.

The milk dish now has Puffed Wheat floating in it—thin, flimsy, toasted bubbles of whole wheat.

Breakfast brings the choice of two Puffed Grains, each with its own fascinations.

Puffed Rice now adds to berries what crust adds to a shortcake. Or a nut-like garnish to ice cream. And between meals hungry children get some Puffed Grain crisped and buttered.

Every day in summer, millions of people now enjoy these supreme food delights.

Now berries
Have Puffed Rice mixed in to form a delightful blend.

But don't treat them like mere tidbits

These flaky, flavory bubble grains seem like food confections. But they are whole-grain foods, remember, and are scientific.

They are made by steam explosion. Every food cell is thus blasted so digestion is easy and complete.

They are the best-cooked cereals in existence—the only cereals so ideally fitted to digest.

They are all-hour foods. They make whole-grain foods tempting. Let children find them handy, morning, noon and night.

In afternoons
Children get Puffed Grains doused with melted butter to eat like confections.

Puffed Rice

Both bubble grains
Puffed by steam explosions to 8

Now ice cream
Is garnished with these

Puffed Grains form the finest cereal dishes ever served at breakfast. No grain foods compare with them in texture or in taste. And never were grain foods so fitted to digest.

See how white teeth enhance it

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Countless women have found a way to whiter, safer teeth. You meet them everywhere. A new method of teeth cleaning is now widely employed, and anyone who watches can see the results of it.

This is to ask that you test it. Watch the results for ten days, then judge for yourself if you need it.

The tooth wrecker

Millions find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. Tartar forms, and often pyorrhea starts.

Most of those troubles are now traced to film. To that viscous coat which you feel with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste cannot dissolve it, so the tooth brush leaves much of it intact.

It is the film-coat that discolors—

Sent to all who ask

A ten-day tube of Pepsodent is sent to all who ask. Thus millions have already proved it. If you have not, write for that tube to-day.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

This method long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. All these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Now a new method

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat this film. Able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Now leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

A new tooth paste has been perfected to meet every modern requirement. The name is Pepsodent. And this film combatant is embodied in it.

harmless activating method, so active pepsin can be every day applied.

The results are quick and apparent. They argue for themselves, and a book we send explains all reasons for them.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Judge by the clear results between the old ways and the new. Do this now, for it is most important. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

The Girls' "Carry-On" Column

New Clothes For Old—At Least That Is What it Meant to Elsie Fergus

By BETTY O'HARA

ELSIE shut the door with a bang. It was the same old story, another invitation sent to all her friends and she had been left out. It was the last dance before the holidays, and was given by one of the girls into whose house she had once been a frequent visitor and a welcome one; but time had changed all that. Since that memorable day two years ago when in answer to a curt summons from the family doctor, she had between sobs and sad good-byes packed her trunk and said farewell to her college days forever, the road had been anything but smooth, for the once athletic class favorite.

In fact so depleted had become the family fortunes after the father's death, that Elsie not only had to buckle down to earn her own living but found it now necessary to give part of her weekly pay envelope to replenish the family larder.

THE dreams of her college days proved to be castles in Spain. Her wanderings and calculations in the land of studios where colors ran riot, her platform career, alas before she started it, tumbled about her ears. But all that was over now, the art to which she had looked forward had been rudely snatched from her uplifted hand; and now the most she could hope to accomplish was to step on the lowest rung on the ladder of commercial art. Not a very high goal for the girl who had had such boundless ambition. Ambition—what right had she to ambition, when she could hardly make enough money to pay her weekly bills?

And for clothes, she had turned her skirt inside out; she had pressed her suit coat to give it a semblance of its once prosperous days, her hat she had worn for two years, and the fact that two or three storms had wreaked their vengeance on it, did not tend to improve its appearance.

BUT this was the last straw, to be cold shouldered by her once intimate friend; and the mirror opposite reflected a worried, hopeless girl. What a different tale that old mirror had to tell to the one it reflected a couple of years ago, when the smiling, dancing figure of Elsie Fergus tripped in and out with her beautiful gowns and entrancing ways. Now it still beckoned her in its old friendly way, but only served to emphasize her misfortune.

"You see me as others see me, old pal," she said in a coaxing tone, "come let's find out just what is the matter with me anyway. The trouble is with myself or my appearance I know, for what do the people outside know of our struggles and heartaches? We try hard to hide them, don't we?" and she sat down and looked into the brown eyes that looked back at her from the mirror depths. "Now you tell me the truth just like you used to do, although it isn't a very gratifying truth in these days, is it?"

WELL I can see for myself that I have accomplished the art of doing my hair in the most homely way; it used to look really becoming when I parted it at the side and fluffed it out at the ears, but somehow every morning time seems so short until I go to work that I just have to fix it anyway, so long as I get it neat. But from now on, oh hear my vow, between the two of us we are going to make the best of what we have, even if it does take a little more energy.

"THEN just look at that wrinkle in my forehead. We will have to stop its most provoking habit of appearing every few minutes. I'll just give it a rub out every day, that will scare it into oblivion—just see if I don't! And have you noticed lately, how my lips have taken a downward droop? It's enough to make any one look 'down in the mouth' the way things have been going, but other people don't know that, just you and I, and they don't make allowances; and anyway no one ever did gain anything by being a perpetual grouch. And then with a brush of the eyebrows I think I will be fairly presentable. You know a rub here and a brush there doesn't cost anything, and it helps a lot. We're strong on the something for nothing idea aren't we?"

"Then there are my clothes, oh, these terrible 'duds'; they do take the heart out of me. It was only last night I saw Jack Moore down town and walked across the street rather than speak to him just because this old suit is such a disgrace that I did not want him to see me in it. It is bad enough to be down on your luck, but to be so far down that you are ashamed to meet your friends on account of your clothes—well, it cannot be tolerated, that's the end of it. It's a new suit, a new hat, and a pair of shoes I need and I am going to have them. This waist will do, it will not be seen when I am on the street.

"But how are we going to go about it? We won't be able to add that much to the weekly pay envelope all at one blow, so it will have to be some money making scheme that I can carry on independent of the office," and the puzzled eyes looked back at her from the mirror. "Oh, I have it," and the mirror lady hopped around her chair once for luck; "the 'Carry On Club' in the 'Canadian Home Journal'—the very thing! I can make extra money, and still keep on with my position to get necessities just the same. It looks good in print so off goes a letter to-night."

And the letter came and with it the story I have just told you. Two months have passed, and a few days ago I sent a bonus check which is large enough to buy the much needed suit even in these days of the high cost of living.

There are many girls who find themselves in the position of this girl. The "Carry On" Club will send you a bonus check, too, if you will write to BETTY O'HARA, Manager of the "Girls' Carry On Club," Canadian Home Journal, and she will tell you how the girls make their money.

ONCE upon a time there was an advertiser who got his copy in ahead of closing dates; he gave the publisher time for careful composition; making of cuts was never left until the "last gun," with the printer holding the presses and running up the publisher's bill. The advertiser always had plenty of time to make corrections and get exactly what he wanted in set-ups. There were no disputes about typographical errors and inadvertent insertions. When he O.K.'d a final proof, it was final. And the advertiser was always pleased with the attention and service the publisher gave him.

MORAL: No publisher can give an advertiser proper service unless copy is received early.

Queen Victoria's Passion for Good Singing and Charming Melody as Revealed by Her Contemporaries

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH.

815.00

LAST month in writing of the early career of Madame Albani, I casually mentioned her later acquaintance with Queen Victoria, which really became a friendship. The close relations that arose between them were born of the sincere musical enthusiasm which characterized the temperament of Her Majesty from girlhood, until extreme old age. The musical reminiscences which cling around her name reveal an intimate side entirely different from the august associations that attach to her as the central figure of a great Empire. They also dispense certain misapprehensions with regard to her which have arisen since her death. It has been carelessly assumed that she was German of the Germans, but her musical enthusiasms show that in a time when the Germans were asserting their claim to be the musical over-lords of the universe, her musical sympathies remained to the end, French, Italian and British as they had been in her girlhood. Though devotedly attached to her husband, Prince Albert, one of the champions of the German school, she did not follow him in this. She was herself excellently trained in music, and it was generally known in musical circles forty years ago that at least one of her children,—her second son, the Duke of Edinburgh, afterwards Duke of Saxe-Cobourg and Gotha,—was so gifted as a violinist that, born in a humbler sphere, he would have become renowned as a virtuoso.

QUEEN VICTORIA AS A YOUNG MATRON

This photograph is from a picture of Her Majesty Queen Victoria in 1843, by F. Winterhalter, at Windsor Castle.

As a child at Claremont, she was trained to play the piano under the supervision of her governess, Louise Lehzen, who though the daughter of a Hanoverian Lutheran pastor, exercised a greater control over her than her own mother. Subsequently when she was a queen and a bride she took some lessons on the same instrument from Mendelssohn, a friend of Prince Albert. She left on record in her diary, her nervousness when she first played for this celebrity; and her pleasure when he discovered in her real talent. Her chief musical ambition, however, was to sing, and good singing was with her a life-long passion, though for years during her widowhood she deliberately denied herself indulgence in this harmless pleasure.

HER letters indicate that she acquired this taste from her mother's brother, Leopold, First King of the Belgians, an uncle who had an intense affection for her and superintended her education for the cares of sovereignty. He was himself an amateur singer of merit and in her correspondence with him she liked to discuss music with him. From allusions therein, it is clear that as a little girl she used to sing with him. Later when she was in her teens, she took lessons from Luigi Lablache, an Italian-Frenchman of enormous physique, who was the greatest basso of his time, and for whom she conceived real affection. He was born at Naples in 1794, and was therefore twenty-four years her senior. From 1830 onward he was a very popular figure in London and Paris, and in 1836, when she was approaching her sixteenth birthday, the Princess Victoria commenced to study with him. In that year he gave her twenty-six lessons before leaving England to fulfil other engagements and she wrote to her uncle of her regret that she must drop them, and of her resolve to resume study the following spring. A few months later she wrote again of her delight at the thought of resuming singing lessons with Lablache, but her plans were interrupted for a few months by her unexpected accession to the throne. So soon as she could arrange it, she reverted to the plan and in August of 1837, wrote to King Leopold: "I have resumed my singing lessons with Lablache twice a week, which form an agreeable recreation in the midst of all the business I have to do. He is such a good old soul, and greatly pleased that I go on with him." (Here the young girl speaks; Lablache was but forty-three at the time and very well preserved). "I admire the music of Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots' very much but do not sing it, as I prefer Italian to French for singing greatly. I have been learning in the beginning of the season many of your old favorites, which I hope to sing with you when we meet. I wish I could keep Lablache to sing with us, but he will be gone by that time I think."

It is clear from her letters that Prince Albert who had in the interim been sent to England to make her acquaintance, had not impressed her by his attempts to sing, but she expressed the belief that the dear boy would improve in time, especially if he took lessons from Lablache.

In the same letter in which she makes this confession, she says: "I sing regularly every evening as I think it better to do so every day to keep the voice manageable. O! my beloved Uncle, could you join us, how delightful that would be. How I should delight in singing with you all our favorite things," and she goes on to specify a number of Italian operas, mostly forgotten.

Her coronation and marriage put an end to the singing lessons, but with her new freedom she became an ardent opera and concert-goer, whenever circumstances would permit, and a very appreciative one. Occasionally she found time to write a bit of musical gossip to the aging uncle, especially when a new star loomed up on the horizon. Thus in June, 1847, she writes: "To-night I am going to the opera in state, and will hear and see Jenny Lind, (who is perfection), in 'Norma,' which is considered one of her best parts. Poor Grisi is quite going off and after the pure, angelic voice and extremely quiet and perfect acting of J. Lind she seems quite passe. The poor thing is furious about it and was excessively impertinent to J. Lind."

Again in 1850, she writes to tell him of an opera, then new, "The Prophet," by Meyerbeer, which she had just heard and says he would take especial delight in the coronation music. She is especially enthusiastic about the great tenor Mario, who in her opinion sings and acts with perfection. "He improves every year," she says, "and I really think his voice is the finest tenor I ever heard, and he sings and acts with such intense feeling."

SOME ONTARIO FEDERATION PLANS.

THE programme of the Standing Committees of the Ontario Federation of Women's Institutes is an ambitious one, which may be outlined, as some of the plans for work. In Agriculture, convener, Mrs. R. G. Leggett, the plans are:

Education:

1. Ask the Branch Institutes to petition their school boards to provide a plot of ground suitable for school gardening.
2. Encourage teachers to qualify themselves to direct the pupils in planting and caring for the garden.
3. Work for the improvement of school grounds and establishment of recreation centres.

Practical Work:

1. Encourage women to become gardeners, small fruit growers, poultry raisers, and bee keepers.
  2. To create market centres for the collecting and disposing of these products.
  3. Promote a general interest in the care and beautifying of Canadian homes by removing rubbish, levelling and mowing lawns, planting trees, shrubs and flowers.
- This programme is being submitted for consideration at the district annual meetings throughout the province and we trust that Institute committees will be formed in many branches to carry on the work.

In Home Economics, with convener, Miss M. U. Watson, Guelph, the plans are:

- To advise the Department as to lines of work to be included in the Demonstration-Lecture Courses;
  - To advise as to lines which could be dealt with to advantage when the instructor is able to deliver only one lecture at each place visited;
  - To recommend list of books for study and reference by the Women's Institute members;
  - To suggest lines of investigation for the Dominion Federation Committee or for the Department of Health being established at Ottawa, and which should include Home Economics, Labor Saving Devices and Methods; Remodelling of Houses; Household Equipment.
- Miss Watson has not yet completed her programme, and will no doubt have much to add to the above, and will submit a more complete programme to the district officers at an early date.

In Immigration, convener, Miss D. M. Sutherland, Toronto, the plans are:

- To secure as full information as possible of immigrant families settling in Ontario, or girls or women employed as Domestic, etc., in homes throughout the Province, from:
  1. The Colonization Department of the Ontario Government.
  2. The Employment Labor Bureau.
  3. The Soldiers' Settlement Board.
- To secure as full information as possible re children being placed in Ontario homes from:
  1. The Children's Aid Society.
  2. The Barnardo Homes.
  3. The Salvation Army, etc.
- The Branches will be notified from time to time as to the placing of the newcomers, with a view to having the Institute members give them a welcome and inviting them to take part in the work of the Institutes and other local activities.
- To have Branch officers forward as full information as possible re the situation in their localities as to the number of newcomers, how they are placed, what is being done for the Children's Aid Society, etc., to the member of the Committee on Immigration for their respective subdivisions.

- To educate through articles written and through lectures etc., the importance of getting in touch with the newcomers and leading them to realize that they have a part to play in advancing community interests.
- To see that the children of immigrant families or those placed in homes by the Children's Aid Society, or the Barnardo Homes attend school regularly.
- To report all cases of cruelty, overwork, etc., on the part of those employing help to the proper authorities.
- To report all cases of children or parents suffering from contagious or infectious diseases or who are mental-

Those dainty Summer repasts that everyone enjoys

IT may be the full-spread luncheon table in city home or vacation cottage—tea on the lawn or in camp—or the picnic hamper, opened beneath the shadowed fringe of highway or river—wherever it is, Swift's Premium Ham, always adaptable, provides delicious menus suited to every summer occasion.

Of course, you can buy Swift's Premium Ham sliced, but there is a big advantage in buying a whole ham—for then you obtain a variety of dishes: you can bake the butt, boil the shank, and fry the centre slices, and never lack a "meat course" as long as a vestige remains.

The careful selection and exclusive, mild cure of ly deficient to the proper authorities, and where necessary take any other action thought advisable.

To co-operate with the Children's Aid Society in securing good homes for the children for adoption, and to take an active interest in supporting local Children's Shelters.

To co-operate with the Girls' Camps in their social activities and to see that no camp is started without a permit from the Government Employment Labor Bureau.

To familiarize all with the Immigration Laws.

The members of the Committee should forward reports of the work done along immigration lines in their respective sub-divisions to the Convener, for publicity and other purposes.

In Education and Better Schools, convener, Miss E. F. McIntosh, Brampton, the plans are:

1. Co-operation through Institutes and schools by means of Home and School Clubs

2. School Improvement—

1. Of buildings now in existence.
2. To see that schools being built conform to all requirements for health and education.
3. To give attention to consolidation.

3. Education—

1. For retarded children.
2. Illiterate.
3. Non-English speaking.

4. School attendance up to 14 years at least of—

1. Children of resident parents.
2. Of "home" girls and boys.
3. Truancy.

5. Competent teaching—

1. Necessary school work.
2. Of Agriculture, Household Science and Manual Training.

6. Teachers' salaries.

The study of school architecture, building, heating and lighting, and the study of grounds, gardens, out-houses and sanitation and recreation, study of equipment, material of all kinds; the use of the school as a community centre and how the Women's Institutes may help teachers, will all come under consideration.

In Public Health and Child Welfare, convener, Mrs. Wilson, Parkhill, the report is:

Mrs. Wilson has not yet her prepared programme beyond the lines indicated in the report of lectures of Conference as found in extracts from address by Dr. Patterson. The work of this Committee is considered of the greatest importance and full particulars as to plans and co-operation with the Institutes will be sent to all concerned at the earliest date possible.

In the meantime, Mrs. Wilson is endeavoring, through her Committee, to find out:

1. The needs of each district.
2. What is being done to meet these needs: (a) By the Government, through public service; Medical Inspection of Schools; Child Welfare Exhibits; Institute lectures, etc.; (b) By voluntary organizations.

When this survey is completed, the convener will be in a position to suggest ways by which the Institutes can co-operate with all agencies in meeting these needs.

The programme of the Committee on Publicity, convener, Miss E. M. Chapman, Toronto, shall be:

1. To try to influence secretaries of Branch Institutes to give as much publicity as possible to the work their Institute is doing by announcing meetings and reporting meetings, programmes, and special features of work to the local papers. This will help to stimulate local interest and a full attendance.

2. To get secretaries or other members of Institutes, or lecturers and demonstrators to report either to the Department of Agriculture, or the Convener of the Publicity Committee, any news of province-wide interest, that it may be circulated through the "Home Journal" and the farm papers of the province. Any special feature of work done by any one Institute should be an inspiration to others.

3. News of any good community or public benefit effort should be sent to the editors of the Women's Section of the city daily papers. The knowledge that the rural women and the city

NEW YORK

LONDON

PARIS

Those familiar with her story know that after the death of the Prince Consort, in 1861, she denied herself all enjoyment. Public appearance at concerts or operas ceased for nearly thirty years, and it was more than a decade before she commenced to rouse herself to a renewed interest in music as a private recreation. Thus she did not hear Patti until that singer had long been recognized as "the divine." It was really Emma Albani, who won her back to enthusiasm. In 1874, when the Canadian prima donna was in her twenty-second year, she was the rage of the London season both in opera and concert, and the Queen, perhaps because she was one of her French Canadian subjects, decided to hear her. Albani was summoned to Windsor Castle and there commenced a friendship which only terminated with Victoria's death. At this first audience she sang the lovely melody "Caro Nome," from Verdi's "Rigoletto," Gounod's "Ave Maria," "Robin Adair" and "Home Sweet Home." The Queen praised her voice and method, and told her in so doing, that she herself was thoroughly acquainted with the art of singing. This mutual interest was a link and Albani says: "That she loved music, it is scarcely necessary to say. Almost every school appeared to appeal to Queen Victoria. Sometimes she would ask me to sing two or three or more little French songs. Then she would suggest something by Brahms, or perhaps Grieg, or possibly Handel or Mendelssohn; and often I have concluded with some simple song I knew she was fond of. Scotch songs in particular appealed to her very strongly. She never grew tired of 'The Blue Bells of Scotland,' which she generally spoke of as 'that Highland Laddie song.' Other Scotch songs of which she was very fond were 'Annie Laurie' and 'Within a Mile of Edinboro' Town.' On other occasions she would ask me to sing for an hour or more nothing but Mendelssohn. Prince Albert had always maintained a very high opinion of Mendelssohn and I am inclined to think that my singing sometimes recalled to the Queen pleasant recollections of the years that had fled. Number after number of Mendelssohn's oratorios she would listen to with rapt attention, and often when I stopped singing she would remain for some moments in a sort of reverie."

THE Queen also loved to hear the music of "Faust," although it was years before she saw the opera, which had first been produced in England shortly after the Prince Consort's death. Albani really induced her to appear in public once more by singing to her some passages from Sir Arthur Sullivan's cantata, "The Golden Legend," in which she sang at the original presentation in Leeds in the later eighties. The Queen one day expressed eagerness to hear the new work in public performance, but later dropped the subject. Then one morning, to Albani's great surprise, she announced her intention of attending a presentation of the work advertised to be given in Albert Hall, London. "The day arrived," says the prima donna, "and when I came forward to sing my first solo and saw the Queen occupying the Royal box, I think I felt more delighted than I had ever felt in my life before."

Naturally the return of the Queen to a musical function after a seclusion covering nearly three decades aroused great public attention. She had for some years previously, however, after the breaking of the ice in 1874, habituated herself to receiving artists in private. Thus in 1886, she summoned the aged pianist, Franz Liszt, to Windsor and told him she cherished vivid recollections of his playing in London in 1841. Earlier still, Rubinstein had received a similar command in company with Georg Henschel, the basso. Henschel tells a delightful story of her tact. Rubinstein's first numbers had been quiet and tender, and she had drawn her chair near to the piano which had its top raised. Later he began to thunder as no pianist before or since has thundered, and Her Majesty became very uncomfortable. Rather than interrupt the musician, she gradually edged her chair away to a safe distance and then a charming smile of relief and pleasure stole over her countenance.

Among her later enthusiasms were Patti and the two De Reszkes, Jean and Edouard, all of whom received decorations from her. She told the tenor, Jean De Reszke, that his voice reminded her of Mario, only that it had more power. The tenor says that she spoke French like a Parisian, and was "a genuine lover of music, as one could easily see by her eyes and in the movements of the head with which she emphasized the chief passages." Six months before her death, in 1900, she summoned the two brothers and a company of distinguished artists to give a performance of her favorite "Faust." Jean was too ill to appear and Saleza was substituted, and after hearing Edouard as Mephisto, she decorated him. Her declining health was apparent to all but she would not forego a reception to the artists after the performance. Another great favorite of hers was "Cavalleria Rusticana," and when Mascagni, its composer, came to England, in 1893, she sent for him, praised his music, and presented him with an autograph portrait in a silver frame. Indeed the Queen loved to bestow souvenirs on musical celebrities and many other composers and singers knew her favor during the last decade of her life. As a noted London musical authority has said, "The Queen's love for music was at no period more strongly evinced than during the last few years of her life. She turned to it for solace and comfort in her old age and derived the keenest pleasure from the performances of the various artists who were invited in quick succession to labor for her enjoyment. Her devoted daughters, Princess Christian and Princess Henry of Battenberg, were ever on the alert to procure talent for this purpose. Scarcely a week passed but that some artist of note played or sang in the Royal drawing rooms at Windsor, Osborne or Balmoral. Lengthy, indeed, must be the list of those, from the diva downward, who can point to their jeweled brooch or pin bearing the familiar monogram "V.R.I.," while many too can display even costlier gifts as tokens of her Majesty's grateful appreciation."

they too shared its delight at the tit-bit.

A shadow fell across the window and the boys looked up to see a man watching them.

"Like birds?"

"Sure, Mister."

"Ain't he the beauty though?" chimed in the younger boy. "Wonder what he's called."

"I know what I'd call him," said his companion.

"What?" eagerly asked the other. "The fire bird. He's just like fire, ain't he Mister?"

"You're right, boy," answered the stranger. "He's like a flame but he's really a Baltimore Oriole. It's cruel to keep him there, he should be free."

"Why?" queried the boys.

"Well, just think how you'd feel if you were locked up in a cage. Not able to run about as you wanted to and away from everything you liked the best. Like the idea?"

"Gee, what a shame," exclaimed the older boy, "but Bill, we could never buy him, never."

"I'll buy him," said the stranger.

Outside, the boys saw the fire bird transferred from the gilded cage to a cardboard box. Eagerly they waited the stranger and as he came out, they asked breathlessly, "Got him, Mister?"

"Surely. Here he is."

"And are you going to let him fly now?"

"Not here, boy. I'm going to take him to where I live, outside the city. Wouldn't you like to come, too? How about asking your parents?"

The older boy put his arm about the younger one's shoulder. "Bill and I ain't got nobody to ask. I sell papers and he helps me, so it don't matter to no one where we go."

The stranger looked at the boys thoughtfully. "I think I'll have some more happiness then," he said. "Come along. You can come back when you're tired." He led the way and hailed the first street car in sight. The boys hung back, but as the door was about to close on the stranger and the fire bird, they climbed aboard and sat down beside their new friend. When they arrived at the car terminal, they found themselves in a new country. A dusty road greeted them with cool green woodlands on each side.

"Tired?" asked the stranger.

"No, sir."

"We'll soon be there," he said as he walked on down the road. Half a mile and then he turned off and entered a path leading through the wood. The boys followed wondering what they would see. A thick hedge barred their way but the stranger found a gate and opening it, stood aside. "Welcome," he said smiling. At the end of a flower bordered path they saw a large vine-covered log house.

In the house the stranger put the oriole into a large cage and gave it food. Later when he and his guests had eaten, he took the cage and bidding them follow, led the way to the orchard. Once there, he set the cage on the top of a high block of wood and opened the door. Softly he stepped backwards and resting a hand on each of the boys, whispered to them not to move. For a minute or two the fire bird looked bewildered. He uttered his plaintive call and to his surprise there came a reply. Again he called and then through the leafy green of the tree above, came a flash of fire as it were, and another oriole alighted nearby. The prisoner in the cage became excited and hopping about, found the open door. Out he stepped. This way and that he looked then the man whistled in the insistent manner common to the oriole family. Both birds peered up and down. The new arrival flew up into the tree. The next moment the fire bird spread its wings and followed and as it vanished, there came down to the waiting trio a song so rich, so full of joy, that the man looking down at the two upturned faces, vowed that they too, should be freed from the city's dusty streets and learn to sing the song of freedom the same as his feathered friends.

the loveliest trilliums I have ever seen. You were told that on stormy winter nights the empty fire-place glowed with embers, and the luscious smell of toasting marshmallows floated in the air while a circle of enchanted young people sat about the hearth, and made merry in the candle light.

French windows led from the dining-room to a splendid garden, where preparations were already on the way for an open air fete, the proceeds of which were to supplement funds already on hand for a summer camp which the Club is establishing at Newcastle. The making of garden hats, aprons and all the paraphernalia for a summer sale was at that time occupying the minds of the members to the exclusion of all other interests.

WE cannot dismiss the Girls' Club without mention of the light that burns every night and all night in the window, a symbol of the persistent hospitality which the Club offers to any girl who needs its shelter at any hour of the day or night. This friendly beacon has been the

THE GIRLS' CLUB

The cheery home, Carlton Street, Toronto, established by the Big Sister Association.

The growing importance of the Association and the rapid realization of many of its hopes and desires are tribute to the progressive and efficient methods of operation which have existed under Mrs. Small's regime.

In March, 1919 there was established at Toronto what is known as the Catholic Big Sister Association composed entirely of volunteer officers and members. Under the presidency of Miss Mary Power, excellent work was accomplished by this branch with members of its own faith and so rapid was the application of Little Sisters and so great the need of visiting and investigating cases, that it was soon found necessary to secure offices and the services of a permanent secretary. The next step was the establishing of a club-room and the Catholic Association now has pretty and comfortable quarters at 80 Bond Street where the Little Sisters and Big Sisters meet and where delightful evenings of entertainment are arranged by the members for their youthful proteges.

Within the last few weeks a Jewish branch has also come into existence.

means of bringing many unhappy wanderers to a haven of security.

Proper care of the feeble-minded, better housing conditions, a living wage for girls and shorter working hours—these are a part of the platform adopted by the Association. Through the efforts of Mrs. Sidney Small, who is in the third term of her presidency, splendid efforts have been made to bring about better conditions in the lives of the girls of the community. Mrs. Small's untiring energy, her inspiring enthusiasm and her clear conception of the particular share of work which the Big Sister Association is called upon to accomplish in the scheme of community service, make her an ideal director of the destinies of such an organization.

of which Miss Kate Josephi is the president and though the matter of its organization is hardly yet complete it is certain that it will not be long before its influence for good will be felt in the community.

As Mrs. Small in a statement contained in an annual report has said: "No appeal has a more reasonable or more urgent claim on the public. Work that tends to protect young girls from evil influence and wrongdoing is a thousand times more valuable and less expensive to Society than measures afterwards made necessary in an effort to piece together the shattered wrecks of human lives, who have found their way into hospitals, asylums and reformatories."

The Land of P'raps

The Down took himself apart, and into his round head he packed all the rest of himself. Then, after rocking back and forth two or three times, he started rolling down the hill, and was soon lost in the distance.

"I wish I could do that," sighed Dedder Naherrin.

As he said this, he stepped to the side of the road on to a narrow, smooth little sidewalk that led down the hill. Dedder Naherrin's feet slipped from under him; he sat down, and started sliding swiftly down the hill.

Diddy could not help laughing as he looked closely at the sidewalk. The shining pavement was made of square blocks, in the centre of which were frozen three black letters—ICE.

Sitting down on the sidewalk carefully, for he did not like to slide on his bare feet, Diddy started downward too.

The little If came after, now sliding on his nose, now on his back, his silver bell and his alarm clock rattling and banging loudly.

One after another they reached the bottom of the hill with a bump. A high wall, clear as glass, stretched across the roadway. It was the end of the July road, and as they looked about for a gateway, a rope-ladder was let down from the top of the wall, and they heard voices singing:

Land of summer breezes straying,
Land of golden sunbeams playing,
Shadowed winter days delaying.

Here amidst the flowers,
Harvest joy, nor e'er remember
August fades into September—
Summer flame to Autumn ember

Live you at playtime hours

LUX

Every woman longs to wear dainty silk lingerie—silk hosiery—blouses of soft silks, Georgette and crepe de chine every day in the week.

But the wear and tear of washing day made these garments a luxury—until Lux was put on the market. Now, no matter how dainty your garments are, Lux will keep them clean and fresh, without the slightest harm in repeated washings.

Lux is the purest of cleansers. It harms nothing that pure water itself may touch. It refreshes colors—it restores fabrics to their original beauty.

It's so easy to wash with Lux suds. Just a few minutes and the washing's done. Try Lux to-day, and you'll be surprised to find how easy and pleasant it is to wash the Lux way.

Every man likes to see a well-dressed, cleanly-dressed woman. Lux will enable you to keep your prettiest things clean and fresh.

A dainty little LUX Recipe Booklet, "The Care of Dainty Clothes," will be sent you on request.

To Wash Silk Underwear and Silk Stockings.

Take two tablespoonfuls of Lux, put into a gallon and a half of boiling water and stir with a wooden spoon or stick until the Lux flakes are completely dissolved. Add cold water until the mixture has become quite tepid. Into the foaming lather dip your underwear or stockings and work them about, squeezing the water through the soiled parts—do not wring.

Rinse in three waters, clear and lukewarm. Squeeze out—but do not wring. Dry in the shade, and when garments are hardly dry press on the wrong side with a warm iron—never a hot one.

MONTREAL

THE civilized world is still in the flood-tide of democracy. Russia's experience of the thing itself, without the neutralizing circumstances that modify its effect elsewhere, is not yet sufficiently realized or understood outside of that unhappy country, to damage the credit of the modern doctrine. Everywhere mass control and mass direction are more and more helplessly accepted, with a tendency to the assumption that the lower the degree of intelligence, capacity and class consciousness brought to the business of governing, the more ideal the results are likely to be. To outward seeming, Canada has subscribed to the popular creed in large letters. It is everywhere reflected in the life of the people, education is based on it, the newspapers trumpet it every day, and Parliament has embalmed it in a monumental resolution. We have even shared, and are now sharing, the actual extremes, imported from Europe, the predatory ambition of the Soviet. Heedless and impatient and absorbed in our suddenly vast business of national exploitation as we are, the activities in Winnipeg last year gave us pause.

There is at present no other than the democratic choice. Perhaps there will never be. It depends upon the interpretation. Control of national affairs implies the power to wield it, and if that power remains guarded by the intelligence, industry and probity of the people, a people's government is simply the best that can be had. If it escapes into the teeth and claws of the brute which nature has given us to develop our civilization out of, we get at least temporary disaster and future reaction.

Canada is, of course, evolving her own social and political fate, but it is interesting to note her advantages of observation and of criticism in this matter of the democratic ideal. They are about as complete as they could be. Across the sea the old Mother of human liberties and of the race that achieved the Republic of the United States, is facing the practical possibility of a Labor government, and learning through the public prints, whether the particular body of workers who handle the coal out-put will please to adopt "direct" or "constitutional" methods of compelling the rest of the community to accede to their demands. To the south of us, where surely the unimpeded control by the people of their own affairs is celebrated, if anywhere, we saw a President indicating to Europe an American line of policy and action for which he is responsible apparently only to himself. These are anomalies and it is perhaps easy to pick anomalies out of any system, but the fact remains that young-eyed Canada has a good deal to consider in the diurnal swing of her sister democracies, based as they are on the same antecedents, the same laws and language, religion and literature as herself.

DEMOCRATIC feeling, democratic theory, we have in plenty of our own. It has been a very natural evolution. Almost all Canadians have escaped from the social tyranny of caste elsewhere. A few brought the tradition with them, not only to Quebec, but to the settlement of Upper Canada. And we have our aristocracy—of the best patent—of United Empire Loyalists. But the bulk of Canada's early population came in emigrant ships from Great Britain, to strike a hardy root in the new land—and to enjoy among its hard won rewards, that of being entirely free from the social claims of the squire and his relations. It was a quiescent sort of satisfaction,—I doubt if it was much talked about. For one thing, too much vaunting of the new condition might have smacked of disloyalty to the ways of the "Old Country," and the Old Country was still very dear. Perhaps theories of equality which made so much noise in the United States helped to prescribe discretion to us. At all events we won our way from our early colonial status to our present completely democratic institutions without any remarkable convulsions. The defeat of the Family Compact took some searching of heart but no blood-shed. Feudal privilege in Quebec gave way gradually. We have grown up a democracy because those clothes fitted us best, we have not jumped into them like the actors in a comedy of costume.

A WELL-KNOWN CANADIAN GOLFER
This shows Miss Ada Mackenzie, Canada's Champion Woman Golfer, playing at Newcastle, Ireland.

Nor, until lately, have we committed ourselves to any repudiation of the picturesque acquiescences that hang like old inherited garments, rich in history, about the shoulders of the vigorous commonwealth of Great Britain, in the shape of titles and decorations. The democratic condition in Canada is so essential and so unescapable that no sort of knighthood would avail to set a man apart from his fellows or, apart from a natural, negligible, and entirely private swelling of the chest, make him different from other men. Besides, for many years, such recognitions from the Throne were not too common in Canada. Compared to the crop that went to India twice annually—on the Sovereign's Birthday and New Year's Day—the self-governing colonies appeared for many a decade to dwell but in the suburbs of the royal favor. Ottawa was practically the only place where you could find a gentleman wearing anything about his neck or on his coat that had been sent him from Buckingham Palace; and even there the exhibition could not be considered either large or exhaustive.

Then came the war and our part in it. England began to decorate us as if she loved us, as she did, and as perhaps if we may say it with modesty, she might. Honors fell thick and fast, not always with that nice discrimination which a public which knew a good deal more about the recipients than the king did, would have liked to see. A was sometimes decorated when B was the worthier fellow. It could hardly be avoided.

England was too busy waging war to scrutinize very closely the comparative deserts of those who bulked large in helping. The same thing was occurring at home. Unluckily we were presently thought suitable for permanent elevation, and baronetcies and a peerage or two crossed the Atlantic to adorn large bank accounts and rub shoulders with ordinary people, strap-hanging in the street cars. This struck a number of plain M.P.'s as going a great deal too far. They called upon the democratic spirit of Parliament to resist this subtle introduction of the aristocratic system to Canada, and Parliament honored the draft.

The people too, had a healthy feeling that inherited rank was illogical and undesirable as a social feature, and that Canada had no use for it. Had we simply registered our objection to the hereditary principle our position would have been both justified and dignified, but that peculiar form of democratic fury which cannot endure to see the bestowal of distinction, however well deserved, took possession of the requisite number of our Parliamentarians, and the country went on record as undesirous of further honors to civilians of any sort. It was a painful and little-minded exhibition, of small gratitude and smaller grace, and the best hope for it is that it may be one day quietly ignored and forgotten; but it is useful as indicating the militancy of the particular brand of democracy that is Canada's.

On the other hand the love of the Royal House and the general tradition of the monarchy is probably stronger in Canada than in any part of the Empire. It is the romance of our political history. Unlike the Americans, our democracy is not based on racial repudiations so easy to justify, so difficult to sustain. The progress of the fair haired boy who walked smilingly on our hearts from the Atlantic to the Pacific last summer, showed the world something of Canada's feeling about the Sovereign and those who stand nearest him as the symbols of all that the Empire means. Nor is there any noticeable impatience with the mild and somewhat archaic satrapy that still survives at Rideau Hall.

We appear to like our Governor-General just as well as if we elected him, perhaps better. The etiquette of a Vice-regal court in no way offends us; our democratic instincts to the contrary, we are entirely pleased with an invitation to dinner. No tongue halts to pronounce "Your Excellency," at least once during the conversation. Military secretaries and A.D.C.'s are tolerated, even admired. The fact is that like our British relatives, we are quite capable of thriving in an atmosphere of political paradox. Canada's democracy is a growth too strong and sturdy to be hampered by picturesque survivals. Nevertheless it develops under their shelter, and their influence upon social theories of the extreme sort is by no means negligible.

CHAPTER V.

SALESMANSHIP IN STANLEY PARK.

"BESSIE INGRAHAM, I don't wonder you're tired of it all, cooped up all day in that sticky, smelly store, smiling and smirking at everyone who comes in with a worn-out nickel to buy a stick of gum. And always poking among candies, and chocolates, and bonbons, and sweets and stuff. Why, girl, you're no better than a fly."

Mollie Aiken delivered this tirade at her friend as they were sitting in a quiet corner of Stanley Park on a Sunday morning. Bessie had received a "call-down" the previous evening, and all the world looked blue.

As a Job's comforter, Miss Aiken was certainly in her element that morning.

"You stand in there all day long, just like the kangaroos in the zoo over there, hopping from one counter to the other, dishing out sweets all the time. No wonder you're sick of it all; so much sweetness would drive anyone crazy. Get out and do something else."

"But what, Mollie? It's almost impossible to get anything to do now at living wages, or I'd have quit the Nectar long ago. What can I do?"

"Housework," said Mollie crisply.

"Thanks, no. There are enough Chinamen here to go round, without my competing against them for housework. Not for me!"

"I've never done much housework," murmured Mollie, gazing down the long, leafy avenue, "but mother did a lot, and she liked it. And your mother is still cheerfully doing her housework over there in Nottingham, isn't she?"

"Oh, that's very different, Mollie. Your mother had a home of her own, and my mother still has hers. That's not a bit the same."

"How did they get those homes?" inquired Mollie so blandly that her friend began to suspect something.

"Why, of course, they got those homes when they married, and—say, you're not thinking you can palm off any of your Cupid customers on to me? Because if you are—"

Mollie ignored the implied threat.

"Listen, honey," she said. "You ought to know better than that. I only make from one to five dollars from each client, and I care no more for a dollar than I do for my little finger. You don't really suppose I'd even try to palm you off on any ordinary matrimonial agency patron. Why, Bessie, you hurt me." Mollie's voice sounded as if the tears were welling up.

"Aw, there, now, dear, forget it, will you. I didn't mean to hurt your feelings about your old agency," consoled the sweet girl.

"I don't mind what you say about the agency, seeing that you loaned me twenty-five dollars to start it going. It's insinuating I'm a cheat that hurts."

Bessie sat bolt upright.

"Say, are you going to start all over again?" she snapped. "What do you mean? Because if you mean what you said you didn't—"

"Now listen to me for a minute, Bessie. I want to talk to you seriously. You're a pretty fair looking, but not quite in the magazine-cover class. You've got a nice disposition, a fair figure, no prospects. You're twenty-eight."

"Twenty-five," interrupted Bessie.

"Twenty-eight years of age," continued Mollie.

"I corrected you once," broke in Miss Ingraham sharply; "twenty-five is right."

"Just as you like, dear. You're twenty-eight, and you're looking—"

"Twenty-five—"

"Now please don't interrupt me, Bessie. This is awfully serious, and I want you to answer a few questions. Are you a good cook?"

"No." The answer was almost surly.

"Well, are you a fair to middling cook?"

"Not even that."

"Then you're a poor cook. Well, that's good enough. Is there anything you can cook well?"

"You ought to know. I can make fudge that just melts in your mouth."

"Fudge! Fudge for a cattle baron!"

Bessie became suspicious. "What do you mean, cattle baron?" she demanded.

Mollie continued placidly: "You're healthy enough; you like outdoor life; you're not nervous—oh, honey, I do hope he'll decide on you."

"If you're going to keep on talking like a lunatic, I'm going home. You're pushing a joke too far." And Miss Ingraham rose from the seat and prepared to leave.

But her friend pulled her back.

"You've just got to listen, Bessie," she said. "And don't get excited like that. Now then, sit down."

To emphasize the request, Miss Aiken dexterously poked the ferrule of a sunshade under the arm of the seat, effectively holding her friend captive.

"I'll break your sunshade if you don't let me go," warned the angry young woman.

"Don't, honey. It isn't mine, it's yours. Mine's over here by—"

"Say, ladies," a gruff voice broke in from behind, "couldn't you do your quarrelling a little more quietly?"

The two girls were startled. Bessie's first impulse was to run away, but the sunshade (cost five dollars) held her back. Mollie held her ground. She had to, to hold Bessie.

"If you don't go away, I'll call a policeman," she said. "And we're not quarrelling; we're—we're discussing a problem in algebra. Now that your curiosity is satisfied," she continued, turning to face the intruder. "Oh, I beg your pardon," she finished lamely.

MISS INGRAHAM looked behind her at the change in her friend's voice. There stood a big policeman, his jovial Irish face wreathed in smiles. He seemed to enjoy the situation immensely.

"That's all right," he chuckled; "if you ladies will get back to your algebra quietly, I'll get this rascal out of the way." And with this, seizing his left arm with his right hand, he declared himself under arrest, and marched solemnly away.

There was silence on the bench for an appreciable time. Mollie was serious; she was not making the progress she had hoped for. And the big policeman had somehow made her feel like a very small girl, when she wanted to feel like a master salesman, for she knew she had a stiff proposition to sell. If Bessie only would be sensible!

Which was just what Bessie decided to be. She felt no desire for another scene, with perhaps a score of spectators. So she said:

"Mollie, I'm going to listen to your fool scheme, whatever it may be. I won't run away, or even argue. I'll just tell you what I think of it when you get through."

Mollie needed no further encouragement. She plunged headlong into the subject; how the big fish had caught the bait at the end of her line; how she was playing him; what a splendid fellow he was; how he reigned a veritable king over an immense domain; how he had great herds of cattle like—like those old Israelites in the Bible, you know; how he had enough horses for a regiment of infantry; and everything, and all sorts of paraphernalia, and, oh, yes, of course, a substantial bank account—"more money, Bessie, than you or I could ever earn if we worked ever so hard until we were so old we'd even tell the truth about our ages."

Bessie shuddered.

"And just to think, honey, Mr. Harrigan sends me such a delicate pen-picture of the kind of wife he wants, and I've looked and looked, and thought and thought, and there isn't a girl in the wide world that's so perfectly his ideal as Bessie Ingraham."

"How much money did you say there was in his bank account?" asked the mercenary Bessie. She had been all attention as the tale of great wealth was gradually unfolded.

"It isn't so much what he has in the bank, dear, though that's thousands of dollars. I've got a report on that, through Teddy Bacon. It's his herds, and his flocks, and his cattle and his horses, and his lands and his ranges and his leases, and his—"

Bessie interrupted. "Is he a millionaire?"

Mollie tried hard to be truthful and enthusiastic at the same time.

"He may be many times a millionaire, for all I know. But I should think he'd be at least once a millionaire. You see he has over a thousand acres of farm land, and you know, farm land that isn't worth a hundred dollars an acre isn't worth having. So that makes his real estate alone worth over one hundred thousand. I haven't any idea what his leases are worth, but they certainly are very valuable. And then there's all those horses and cattle, and the implements and paraphernalia. Yes, he should be at least once a millionaire."

"Do you think he'd settle a hundred thousand or so on the bride? You know the British Columbia laws are most unfair towards married women. I've read that somewhere." Bessie was decidedly interested by this time.

Mollie pondered. She thought of that closing paragraph in the first letter, and she had grave doubts that a man who ordered a wife shipped C.O.D. Soda Creek would be so very generous in the matter of a marriage settlement. But she said nothing about that. Instead:

"He says he'll certainly let you have all the money you can possibly want. I think, Bessie, you'll find him very generous."

Mollie had met many book agents in her time, and had learned from them the selling advantage of placing the prospect in the position of one who has already bought and only awaits delivery of the goods.

But Bessie also had met many book agents. So she countered:

"Any woman that gets married in British Columbia without protecting herself by insisting on a pre-marriage settlement is laying a sure foundation for future trouble. The crying injustice of—of—I forget the rest, Mollie, but it's a solemn warning not to be lightly overlooked."

"I wouldn't like to say what could be done in that line," said Mollie, "but I'm sure you'll get along fine with Mr. Harrigan."

"I wonder," said Bessie slowly, "if Mrs. Harrigan—she repeated as if practising—"if Mrs. Harrigan could be expected to milk the four hundred cows."

"Oh, I hardly think so. Mr. Harrigan surely has a hired man, so I suppose he does the milking before breakfast and after supper. Or perhaps they have a separator to do the milking," volunteered Mollie hopefully, out of the depths of her ignorance.

"Quite likely," said Bessie. "Well, let's get back to town and have lunch. I'll let you know what I think about it pretty soon. What day does the mail leave for Mr. Harrigan's country?"

"It leaves here every day," answered Mollie, quite truthfully.

CHAPTER VI.

HOW MOLLIE BORROWED TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS.

MISS INGRAHAM certainly fulfilled her promise to "think it over." She thought of little else for several days, and far into several nights. She was harassed by conflicting emotions, but to the best of her ability weighed the pros and cons of the Harrigan proposition fairly, striving not to let her reason be too easily swayed by her instinct. Reason inclined, but instinct rebelled.

Logically, the scheme strongly appealed to her from a business point of view. She would be getting the best of the bargain, inasmuch as she would get a husband and riches, while the other party would get a wife without a dowry. She would be exchanging a salary of nine dollars a week for half a share of a plethoric bank account, a large herd of cattle, and a vast landed estate. The bank account was the Harrigan asset Miss Ingraham could best visualize; she understood wealth in monetary terms. Dollars were something tangible; she could think intelligently in terms of concrete cash; she had a little (oh, such a very little) in her possession. And she handled dimes and dollars every day at the Nectar.

But cattle and farm machinery and land leases were merely the names of vague things which she could not mentally classify and review. She had never seen a farm or ranch at close range, and only knew in a general way that milk and butter and vegetables came from the farm. With regard to a beef ranch, and its operation, her mind was as perfect a blank as could be found. Until the interview with the aggressive manager of the Cupid Exchange in Stanley Park, she had not known beef was raised in Canada.

But if her reason impelled her to throw in her lot with the cattle baron of Quesnel Lake, her finer instincts just as strongly urged her to the opposite course.

Her childhood and early life had been spent among surroundings of modest comfort and refinement, and the training of those years had never been forgotten in the later days of the stern struggle for existence. Miss Ingraham had thought of marriage always as a sacred institution, not to be undertaken lightly, but only after careful consideration, and courtship, and consent of parent or guardian. But now, being her own guardian, Miss Ingraham had to make the great decision without outside assistance, unless she cared to further consult her friend Mollie. She did not want to do that, because, though she might be sincere, Mollie was also certainly biased. And Miss Ingraham knew how cleverly Mollie could plead and argue!

She had not forgotten the day Miss Aiken borrowed twenty-five dollars from her to start the Cupid Exchange. That was nearly two years ago, when the friendship between the two girls was only a few weeks old. Miss Aiken was at that time a free lance stenographer, with a great deal of idle time on her shapely hands. She did not like being idle. Idleness meant loss of possible revenue, and the young lady dearly loved an honest dollar, not for its own sake, but for its purchasing power. For a long time she cast about before finally deciding to devote her surplus time and ability to what promised to be a profitable side-line, a matrimonial agency. In a few months the side-line had become the sole business of the enterprising young woman, though it had never yielded the great profits which had appeared so certain on paper.

Miss Aiken had first broached the subject to her friend on a rainy Sunday afternoon, when they were in Miss Ingraham's room, and although the project did not appeal to Miss Ingraham at first, she soon fell under the spell of enthusiasm, and the two girls spent several hours laying out a plan of campaign, forgetting all about going to church, as usual, until it was much too late.

"It's this way, Bessie," Miss Aiken had said, after broadly outlining her programme; "I've got to have somebody help me get the agency started. Someone must criticize my plan, and find the weak spots in it, and yet be discreet and not gossip. So that's why I selected you for my confidante."

"I don't really like the idea of marrying men and women through an agency," protested Bessie. "It's hardly Christian. And that's the main object of your agency, isn't it?"

"The main object of the agency is to put dollars in my bank account," elucidated Mollie. "I don't think it's any worse running a matrimonial agency than it is to be forever match-making, like most middle aged women. Or even as bad as contracting alliances, the way it's done between royal families, when the parties most interested haven't a word to say about who'll be their future partners. That's most unfair, I think. Personally, I'll guarantee that none of my clients will ever marry each other, if that will make you more comfortable. They'll just have a lot of fun writing to each other, and I'll catch a dollar coming and going."

"How are you going to find your clients, Mollie?" inquired Bessie.

"By classified advertising. It will cost two cents a word in the Personal Column, among the matrimonialists and fortune tellers, which is the only place the papers are willing to run matrimonial ads. At first I'll be able to afford advertisements only on Saturdays, when the papers have their biggest circulations. This is what I've written for a starter. How do you like it?"

"Smiling Cupid wings his shafts from Love's headquarters, Cupid Exchange, Box X448, Vancouver. Send ten cents for list of clients. Absolute secrecy."

Miss Ingraham did not seem to catch the drift of the argument. She looked puzzled as she asked what the ad. meant.

"It means," answered Miss Aiken, frowning a little, "that Cupid's shaft went over your head. We'll try again, dear public."

With that she tore the paper into small pieces, then wrote out this sober, matter-of-fact announcement:

"Courtship—Marriage: Refined ladies and gentlemen introduced. Send ten cents for selected list of clients. Cupid Exchange, Box X448, Vancouver."

Miss Ingraham said that was fine, but where was the list of clients? How could one be made before there were any clients?

Miss Aiken explained this:

"Well, honey, we can't wait, can we? We must have a list to start with, so we'll just have to write the descriptions of our clients in advance. You understand, we'll get clients to fit the descriptions, instead of the other way around. The Cupid Exchange will start off with sixty-four clients, forty

"They're All Alike"

There is a time when the force of sex sympathy makes itself unmistakably felt. When a man comes home in the evening, to admit that he has forgotten to order the very thing his wife told him to be sure about, also to admit that the letter to her Cousin Mary is yet unposted, if there is another woman present, there is an electric flash of sympathy between the two before the wife's protest becomes vocal.

"Just like a man!" is almost certain to be the exclamation in the first moment of wrath, and the man usually bears this implied condemnation of his sex with becoming meekness. He knows that he has failed to pass the domestic test; but he does not allow depression to settle too heavily upon him. After all, women are inferior creatures, with a foolish way of magnifying trifles.

There comes, too, the occasion when lovely woman asks aimlessly what is trump or wonders why a Dominion election is not held every year. Then her husband catches the eye of a brother man and there flashes again the gleam of sex sympathy, while, if they happen to speak in passing, there is the confidential half-whisper, half-chuckle—"They're all alike." Thus, there is consolation for the forgetfulness of man and the vagaries of woman when there is present someone who can understand the bewilderment of the one who is temporarily offended.

There is a certain sameness, to be sure, in all this criticism of the opposite sex, which indicates that it is merely a more-or-less habit. Woman changes her mind—man changes his heart. The more we see of the ways of the sons of Adam and the manners of the daughters of Eve, the more thoroughly we agree with Mrs. Foyser when she says: "I'm not denying the women are foolish—but the Lord made them to match the men."

ladies and only twenty-four gentlemen, because most of the business will come from girls playing they're looking for a husband, and we mustn't make it too hard for them to choose. Let's each write a thirty-word description of a lady, and see how it reads."

Miss Aiken scribbled a few words before she stopped and gazed at her friend, who had not yet commenced.

"Describing an imaginary person is not so easy as I thought," she remarked. "Do blue eyes and yellow hair go together?"

"Don't ask me," answered Bessie, hopelessly. Then she smiled, and commenced to write.

MISS AIKEN saw the smile. She understood, and smiled, too. In a couple of minutes the girls exchanged their papers. Bessie had written:

"Stenographer, twenty-five, brunette, dark brown hair, brown eyes, height five feet five inches, plump, cheerful, good business woman, fond of sports, Presbyterian, quiet dresser, English good education, has travelled, highest references."

Miss Aiken's description was:

"Cashier, tall, slim and beautifully proportioned, grey eyes, black hair, very companionable, likes books, drama, flowers and music, nice complexion, English, in Canada several years, Reformed Episcopal, splendid swimmer and dancer."

"I'm not plump," protested Mollie with a laugh. "But the rest of the description is all right, except that 'fond of sports.' It sounds a little too fresh."

"And I'm not slim, nor do I like books very much," laughed back Miss Ingraham. "But it's certainly easier to write a description when you're looking at a person, than to invent one."

"Who is that girl in the picture hat?" inquired Miss Aiken, with apparent irrelevance, nodding towards a photograph on the bureau.

"A girl I knew in Winnipeg, Jessie Heaton, I don't know where she is now, but she's such a swell looker I've always kept her photograph. Why, Mollie, how would it do . . ."

"Fine," interrupted Mollie, "that's the very thing."

"I've got quite a few other photos and snapshots," went on Bessie, becoming enthusiastic, "and they will help out on the list a whole lot. A picture is almost as good as a person to help you in writing thirty words, more or less."

While looking for the helpful snapshots in her trunk Miss Ingraham found a magazine with a colored picture of a wonderful maiden on the front cover, one of those soulful, dreamy girls, with large lustrous eyes, cherry red lips, an adorable nose, and a wealth of golden hair floating upwards and backwards, throwing an ineffective veil over the 48-point type that shouted the name of the magazine to the passer-by.

"I'll make you a present of this lady," said Bessie, "she can be the Queen of your Harem."

"She's a beauty," agreed Miss Aiken, "in she goes." In two minutes the siren of the front cover was reduced to twenty-seven words, including her presumed virtues and accomplishments. Panning was in the list, Mollie explained, because of the cheeks.

The magazine proved a veritable treasure-trove. Clever authors, in describing their heroes and heroines, had drawn pen pictures which quite satisfied the head of the Cupid Exchange, so Mollie Aiken became a rank plagiarist. Later, when she published her list of clients, the Copyright laws of the United States and Canada were violated, but such trifles failed to trouble her conscience.

The only difficulty was that the magazine writers were paid by the word, while the Cupid Exchange would have to pay by the word. Condensation was therefore essential, and it was not always easy to reduce rhapsody to prose. Miss Ingraham was appealed to for help in one case.

"Here's a young man described only as 'Debonair.' What do you think that means, Bessie?"

Miss Ingraham stole a quick glance at a picture in the magazine. It had nothing to do with the debonair young man, but it supplied a splendid false clue.

"Without being too sure," volunteered Bessie, "I think it means he wears his hair pompadour style."

"Thank you," said Mollie, very politely, "we'll let it go at that."

"How will you know who's who?" inquired Miss Ingraham, alluding to the photos and descriptions on the table.

"Oh, I guess we'll number the clients."

"One to sixty-four, I suppose."

"I suppose not," came the positive answer. "The numbers will be anything from 9986 to 11,875. One to sixty-four! That would look fine for a matrimonial agency established in 1886, as anyone will be able to see by the letterhead."

"Founded in 1886? You know that isn't so, Mollie."

"But it is so." . . . This in most decided tones. "Am I not the matrimonial agency, wholly and absolutely. And the matrimonial agency is me. We two are one and the same thing. Therefore, as I was born in 1886, the Cupid Exchange came into being at the same time, but it wasn't baptized until recently. That's quite evident, isn't it?"

"It might as well be, since you've decided on it," answered Bessie.

Late in the evening Miss Aiken again referred to a suggestion which her friend had scouted earlier in the day, that Miss Ingraham should be a silent partner in the agency. But that young lady was adamant. From a detached eminence she was willing to give advice and criticize, supply descriptions of mythical clients, and loan photographs of lost friends or distant relatives. But to be one of the proprietors of the concern—Never.

Miss Aiken was greatly disappointed. Bessie would have been so useful in many ways. She always showed such splendid judgment.

AND then, with great diplomacy, Miss Aiken went into the matter of costs, giving her friend as much information as the most conservative banker would require of any new business venture. The Cupid Exchange needed printed envelopes, letter-heads, a Client Sheet, such a lot of stamps, carbon paper, cash for the advertisements, cash for the postoffice box, and cash for petty expenses.

After alluding to her recent enforced idleness and comparing it with her friend's assured position and regular salary, Miss Aiken sought a decision on a minor point, the interest that should be paid on a loan, amount not yet mentioned. The principal, of course, would certainly be repaid within a month, for by that time the dimes and dollars would be just rolling into the coffers of the Cupid Exchange.

Miss Ingraham didn't want any interest.

Miss Aiken insisted. A promissory note for thirty days, she contended, would not be valid unless it bore legal interest. Her friend's experience in high finance did not provide her with arguments in rebuttal, so she finally agreed; Mollie was so insistent on five per cent.

So the head of the Cupid Exchange made out a thirty-day note for twenty-five dollars and insisted on it being accepted in spite of protestations that all that could possibly be spared now was fifteen. Mollie magnanimously agreed to take the fifteen now and the balance in two instalments of five dollars each, on Bessie's next pay days.

To the credit of both young women be it said that each discharged her obligation to the letter, and so the Cupid Exchange became an established and occasionally profitable institution. But there were times when Mollie Aiken sighed a little as she drove her trade in the marts of romance, for once upon a time she had built herself a house of happy dreams. And then . . . one night she had cried herself to sleep, for that day a fair young man had stepped out of her life.

BILL LAFHAMME, postmaster of Khakala, was likewise its sole population. He was a tall thin, wiry French Canadian, twenty-three years of age, but wise beyond his years in the lore of the woods, and the ways of the wild animals which he trapped in the winter. There was more money in collecting furs than in driving the mail stage, and sometimes, when it would have been very inconvenient to travel the forty-five miles to Soda Creek, Bill, in despite of postal regulations and bondsmen's guarantees, would shrug his bony shoulders and say to himself:

"After all, dere is all-ready two week' dey wait for dere letter and journal—a few day' more don' mattaire."

The postmaster was right. No one ever complained if the mail was late; in fact, no one knew for certain what day the mail should come in. Bill was everybody's friend, and no one ever said a word to him, much less made a formal complaint. It was no secret that the continuance of the Khakala post-office was by no means warranted by the business done, and the department might gladly seize on any excuse to close it down.

As postmaster, Mr. Lafamme was presumed to be on duty at the post-office from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. every day, Sundays included. He was paid fifty dollars a year for this, an average of thirteen and a half cents a day. Naturally Bill never stayed home, but there was no lock on the cabin door, and whoever came for mail went in and tumbled out the sacks for their own and their neighbors' letters or papers. If Bill happened to be around he would come in and say: "Hello Dick, got your letter, hein? Well, we'll have a leetle dinner to eat, hein?"

If the postmaster wasn't around, the guest helped himself to Bill's beans or bacon, and brewed himself some tea. After dinner he would wash up the dishes, and the other dirty dishes Bill generally had around. Then he would go out and fatten the wood-pile. It was an unwritten law that sawing a few sticks of firewood discharged the obligation incurred by feeding a saddle horse and self at Bill's expense. Bill would have been insulted had anyone tendered cash payment, but sawing wood was merely an aid to digestion.

Quite often guests stayed overnight at the post-office, sometimes when the host was there, more often when he was away. It made no difference to Bill who slept in his bed. His shack was "Home, Sweet Home," to one and all.

And yet with all his freedom, Bill was not quite satisfied with life. He liked the vast solitudes of the north, the roaming life of the trapper, and the free and easy visits of his friends, but back of it was the national French-Canadian's love of home, and wife, and family.

It was not Lafamme's fault that he was single. Sam Floyd was to blame.

"I always bus' me up agains' heem," Bill would explain, "but some day I'll bus' heem yet."

This in spite of the decided moral victory scored by Floyd at their last meeting. Floyd was returning from Soda Creek with a load of supplies when Bill caught up to him with the mail stage. Bill tied his team to the wagon while he walked alongside with Floyd.

"And how is Mees Alice?" asked Bill after the first greetings had been exchanged.

"H'Emma's fine and dandy," answered Floyd. "She's an awful fine girl, h'Emma, Bill."

"Ah, yes. And how is Mees Alice?"

"No matter about Alice, Bill. I told you before you can't have Alice."

"But why not?" protested Bill. "If you t'ink I'm good enough for your girl Emma, den I'm good enough for your girl Alice. Dat's in reason, sure."

"No, t'ain't reasonable," retorted Floyd, "Alice is my eldest girl, and I gotta have her to keep house for me. H'Emma you can have any time you like."

"I don't wan' Emma, I'm tellin' you. She's too young. Seventeen—is dat an age to marry? And I don't lak' her lak' I lak' Alice. And she looks wit' her eyes nort' eas' and sou' wes' all de tam'." which was Bill's expressive way of describing a slight strabism on young Emma's part.

"You can't have Alice, Bill, and that goes for all time. I'm not going to change my mind," Floyd was quite emphatic.

"Nor me neider, my min' don't change. Alice, dat's de one I wan'," Bill was very positive.

"Well," said Floyd grimly, "if you don't want h'Emma, Bill, you needn't come around the shack any more. Savvy?"

"What! not come roun' to see the lil' girl?" Bill was clearly distressed.

"Not unless the little girl is h'Emma," said Floyd in tones of finality.

The ultimatum depressed Bill. To be deprived of the privilege of seeing his lil' Alice was almost as bad as being forced to marry the nor' eas' and sou' wes' Emma. In some ways it was worse for it was a present evil, the other remained a possibility of the future.

THE two men walked along in silence for a few minutes.

"Well?" said Floyd at last.

"Well," Lafamme spread out his hands in a despairing gesture, "You know I tole you I don't lak' Emma lak' I lak' Alice."

"H'Emma's all right," consoled Floyd.

"Mebbe, mebbe, but I don't know dat I wan' Emma, I lak' Alice, and," suddenly brightening up, "I t'ink Alice laks me."

"H'Emma likes you too."

"All de sam', I'd much more lak' Alice. I'll see what she says about my takin' Emma," surrendered Bill at last.

They had left it at that. Bill had continued his visits to the Floyd ranch, and had talked at great length with his Alice over her father's proposal. She had hotly protested at being relegated to the minor role of prospective sister-in-law, and it had taken much voluble explaining and calisthenics on the young man's part to get her to reach an understanding that would be satisfactory to all concerned.

Except, possibly, Emma, whom no one consulted. Bill had been telling his troubles to Frank Hayes when the latter had come over for mail. Harrigan's ranch was nearly twenty miles from the post-office, and Hayes was giving his horse a long rest before starting back.

"Trouble!" said Hayes scornfully, "you think you have trouble over your love affair. Why, man, your troubles are nothing to mine."

"Ah," said Bill, with a knowing shrug, "you are married, an' your wife she's comin' up here, hein?"

"That would be simple. But I'm not married, Bill, nor going to be. And from the look of things Cory isn't either."

"I don't t'ink Cory'll ever get a woman," confided Bill.

The two girls spent several hours laying out a plan of campaign.

"I think you don't know anything about it, Bill, and that you're just about right."

Frank Hayes had some cause for depression just then. He had just been reading a long letter, addressed to Cornelius Harrigan, Esq., from the Cupid Exchange. It recounted at great length the virtues of a lady client, a female paragon, who had listened to the paeans of Harrigan praise sung by the Cupid Exchange, and was willing that Mr. Harrigan's search for a partner should go no further. The appearance, age and parentage of the young lady were detailed.

But then the Cupid Exchange intimated, in the interests of its fair client, that a pre-marriage settlement on the lady would be advisable, having in view the deplorable laws of British Columbia with regard to married women (with which Mr. Harrigan was no doubt thoroughly familiar).

Frank Hayes felt a sinking sensation in the pit of his stomach. This was even worse than he had anticipated.

When the Cupid Exchange enclosed three photos of the lady client, front face, profile, and an amateur snapshot, Hayes thought that a good idea. But when the Cupid Exchange requested photographs of Mr. Harrigan, his house (how many rooms, and was it thoroughly up-to-date; please describe it), his ranch, and his herd of Aberdeen Angus in return, Hayes groaned.

No one would be crazy enough to round up cattle at that time of the year for a photograph or any other purpose, a picture of the ranch could only be taken from an airplane, a photo of the house would effectively keep any woman from harboring thoughts of becoming its mistress. As to the photograph of Cory Harrigan—Oh, what was the use?

Still, something had to be done, and after the first fit of despondency, Hayes rose to the occasion. To take photographs, a camera was necessary, and there was only one in that part of the country. It belonged to Jo Frushing, and as he was taking letters and papers there on his way back he decided to discuss his troubles with the amateur photographer.

If he could get help from that quarter, Hayes felt the battle was almost as good as a draw already. Jo might look on the whole thing as a rich joke, and be willing to help it along, or, on the other hand, Jo might tell both Hayes and Harrigan to go to perdition.

For, to put it mildly, Jo Frushing was vehement at times—although a lady.

CHAPTER EIGHT

FRANK HAYES' SYNONYMS

"IT'S raining pretty hard, Frank," remarked Harrigan one morning after breakfast. "Guess we'll do some inside work this morning. There's not enough fir bark to do much blacksmithing, though."

"Well, then," suggested Hayes, "leave that for a while. There's nothing rushing, anyway, and I want to get my hair cut. Yours needs trimming, too," a remark which was decidedly pertinent, for Harrigan's hair had not been cut for over four months.

"Go to it," said Harrigan.

So Hayes "went to it." He handled the shears with a facility born of some experience, for he and Harrigan had alternated in the role of tonsorial artists for the past eight years. Probably your perfumed city barbers would have sniffed disdainfully over what Hayes and Harrigan called a finished job, but they always accomplished the main purpose of making each other's head more comfortable. At the end of a couple of weeks hardly any evidence remained of accidental slashes or over-looked ridges. In the matter of style they did not vary much, they generally cut it pretty short, just a millimetre or so above convict crop.

Harrigan seated himself close to the open door. A delicate operation like hair cutting demands plenty of light. Hayes commenced operations, and, following the time-worn precedent of barbers, started the conversation:

"It's wonderful how a couple of photographs show up in this place. That one by the shot-gun seems to catch the eye all the time."

"That's the best picture of the three," agreed Harrigan.

"Very often these matrimonial agency sharks use photographs taken ten or twelve years earlier," said Hayes, "but this picture can't be more than two years old, at the most. Those big beads Miss Cupid is wearing haven't been in style much more than eighteen months."

"She'd be about twenty-five, by that likeness," mused Cory.

"Yes, just about. Though you can't tell much about a girl's age until she tells you, and you've added what she's forgotten to her figure."

"Age don't matter if there isn't too much of it," said Cory, "and it's offset by plenty of good health. She sure looks healthy."

"She says she is. And she's a good business woman, too, so the fat middle-aged shark says in her letter. (Don't lean quite so far back, Cory). You thought any more about that pre-marriage settlement?"

"No," answered Cory, composedly.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"Nothing, I got a banker now. All I want is a wife. She couldn't do anything with money in here, anyway, and all she wants to buy from the outside she can get by cheque. The women's laws of British Columbia don't keep me from treating her right, and that's all I want to do."

"Never having studied law," said Hayes, "I don't know much more—hold your head over on that side. Cory—I don't know much more about Married Women's Rights or Wrongs than Sylvia Pankhurst does about trapping muskrats. But I gather from this letter that the young lady is decidedly nervous about what will happen to her after you die."

"She's looking a long way ahead for trouble," said Cory. "Besides, she'll probably die first. I'm tougher than she'll be."

"All the same—bend your neck a trifle—you might make your will in her favor, seeing you don't carry any insurance."

"Sure," readily agreed Harrigan, "that would be all right. Go easy around that ear, there. You've stuck me twice."

"Oh, never mind a little thing like that, Cory. You'll have your chance to prod me in a few minutes. I'm quite satisfied with the progress I'm making. You'll look almost human again after you've had a shave."

For Hayes was making good progress, in more than hair-cutting. With the help of Jo Frushing he had evolved a scheme that would enable him to comply with most of the requests of the Cupid Exchange letter.

"You're a pair of long-eared fools, the both of you," Jo Frushing had said, "and which is the bigger fool I won't tell; Cory for wanting to get married, or you for undertaking to find him a wife. And now that you're mixed up with these agency

In the Time of White Butterflies

By LOUISE MOREY BOWMAN

PURPLE ASTERS

Oh! my Love was softly singing down among the purple asters,
With a host of small white butterflies about her golden head.
Her blue eyes were dark and wistful, and my heart flashed, strange and sudden,

To my brain—"Oh, Sweetheart, Sweetheart! Could I live if you were dead?"

One small butterfly went soaring, far above the purple asters.
My Love raised her eyes and watched it, tilting back her golden head—

"Where art going, little White Wings?
You will die among those tree-tops;
Come you back to purple asters,
To your white hosts in the sunshine
And your honey drops for bread."

Long ago that dream-filled morning: but each year the purple asters

Woo again the myriad small, white butterflies.
Somewhere down the years I'll find her with a white host in the sunshine—

Though the purple asters blossom where she lies.

SILENCE

As I grow wiser I seek for Silence,
And woo her and follow her
Through the world's byways—
Far into shadowy forests and valleys,
Guided by calls of birds dulcet and lonely.

All in the time of white butterflies
Dreamed I of Silence—and woke—and beheld her—
Pearl-tinted flesh, and two stars softly shining;
Misty grey draperies, floating and filmy.
But when I followed and strove to enfold her,
Silence had gone. How the great pinewood murmured!
Only within the green depths a white butterfly,
Still—in the dew-bathed heart of the pinewood.

But now once more, through a thund'rous sea music—
Just as the filmy grey mist falls about me,
Silence calls softly, above a vast ocean.

IF Matilda had not, in defiance of the first elements of good breeding, looked over the old gentleman's shoulder, it never would have happened. But then, as everybody knows, great oaks from little acorns grow.

Matilda, I say, looked over the old gentleman's shoulder. She just couldn't help herself. There was such an irresistibly funny picture in the comic paper he was reading. Also there were several minutes to while away before the train that was to bear her on the final stretch of the homeward journey would arrive at the Junction. Perhaps her interest in the picture made her draw a little nearer than she realized.

Now there are some people to whom such an act is as offensive as a squeaky lead pencil to the average individual. Obviously the old gentleman belonged to this class. Had his spirit not kept pace with his years or had he been a less crusty and self-contained old person the consciousness of a young creature of the genus flapper peering over his shoulder would not have caused any extraordinary repulsion. As it was he fidgeted uneasily, then jerked away suddenly.

Simultaneously came the tinkle of glass on the platform, and a smothered exclamation.

Matilda at once became aware of a very personable young man who had evidently been sitting on the same bench on the far side of the old gentleman, and who was now ruefully salvaging what remained of a pair of eyeglasses.

"I must really apologize, sir. I—I fear I have occasioned you considerable inconvenience." The old gentleman was very red, very dignified, and very uncomfortable.

The young man looked up in time to catch Matilda's glance. Then he did a very reprehensible thing. The young man winked! Now there are winks and winks. There are sly winks, and furtive winks, and distinctly rude winks. But this wink was different—it was a friendly, open thing. Matilda was a carefully brought up young lady but this caught her off her guard, and she signalled back with a smile before she knew what she was about. When she averted a rather flushed face, and resumed her place on the bench, the mischief was done.

"It's quite all right, sir. Accidents will happen. Probably as much my fault as yours. I was just looking around to see—something." Matilda became aware of the fact that the young man had accepted the apology in a commendably gracious way, and had also resumed his seat at the other end of the bench. Former conditions were thus restored—with one exception. The old gentleman seemed to have permanently vacated. She could see his coat-tails flapping in the breeze well up the platform where he stood reading the train bulletin.

Did you ever struggle between the desire to look and the knowledge that one's duty was not to look? No? Then you are not really human and should not be reading this story. Matilda was very human—as most flappers are—and the struggle was intense. Was he looking her way? If she had been sure that he was not she would have chanced a glance. But she was not sure.

With a sense of duty strong upon her Matilda forced her glance to take in the objects within a limited circle of vision—the hoardings opposite with their glaring announcements of condensed milk, cooking stoves, hosiery and other uninteresting commodities; the poorly-kept platform with its worm-eaten planks and its little pile of luggage and its waiting groups of passengers; and, finally, the station buildings themselves, seeming fairly to exude mustiness and the stale odor of tobacco. Three rounds of this group of prosaic objects and Matilda felt she must complete the circle of vision—or explode!

Then a ray of hope appeared. Matilda's eye was just beginning to travel along the bench when it fell on the humorous weekly which was the original cause of all the trouble, and which—probably in his confusion—the old gentleman had left behind. Her hand slipped over and closed on the magazine. To her horror at this precise moment a masculine hand appeared from the other end of the bench—evidently bent on the same mission. A little tug—a stifled gurgle from Matilda—and an amused chuckle from the other end of the bench.

"I beg your pardon. Won't you take it?"

Matilda looked up, and encountered one of the most engaging smiles in her short career. It was one of those expansive smiles that start at the mouth and spread, and spread until eyes and nose and every feature seem to contribute their share to an expression of all-pervasive good-humor.

"Oh, thank you." She found her tongue at last. "But it really doesn't matter. I wish you'd take it."

"Nothing doing. You got there first."

"But you—you—"

He laughed.

"I admit I won the tug-of-war," he said. "But see here—let's compromise. Can't we both look at it?"

"Oh, but really I couldn't."

"And why not?"

Matilda regarded him in pained surprise.

"Why, we've never been introduced."

"Good heavens—is that all? I was afraid it might be something serious."

"It's very important," declared Matilda properly.

"Absolutely," he agreed readily. "So let's get introduced. My name's Robert—Bob for short. And yours?"

Matilda looked dubious. The young man smiled again. She capitulated.

"Mine's Matilda."

"What a pretty name!"

"Oh, do you really think so? I hate it, but I'm named after an aunt of mine. She's rich." Matilda, you see, was very young and inexperienced.

She thought he was paying her a special compliment instead of using a time-honored formula.

NOW had anyone told Matilda ten minutes before that she would shortly be sitting on a public bench sharing a magazine with a young man she had never seen before she would have been properly shocked and not a little indignant. Yet such was the situation she found herself in, with all thought of impropriety superseded by a sense of delicious adventure. Which would lead one naturally to moralize on the necessity of flapperish young people, when traveling alone, strictly "minding their own business!" However, we must stand by the facts of Matilda's case.

"There's the picture that caused all the trouble," she was saying. "You know I'm really to blame for those poor glasses of yours. I shouldn't have been looking over his shoulder that way—but I was."

"So was I," he confessed with a grin.

"Really? How funny. But it is a clever picture isn't it?"

"That," he told her, "isn't the picture I was looking at."

"Silly!" she chided. "It must have been. It's the only one on the page. What else could you have been looking at?"

"You!" he confessed shamelessly.

Now the flapper who is unhappy over so obvious a compliment is yet to be found. But at the same time such boldness must meet with summary punishment. Matilda, had she sought to analyze her emotions, would have found many conflicting feelings. Anger probably predominated—but a thrill of pleasure ran through it all. And was there not some justification? Not two hours ago Matilda had looked into her mirror and found the result not at all displeasing. And it is nice to have confirmation of one's judgment.

Her effort, however, to simulate righteous indignation and maintain an icy aloofness for the next five minutes deceived no one. Worst of all the young man refused to be snubbed. He absently turned the pages of the magazine, and kept up a running fire of comment, in tormenting indifference to the cold silence with which his remarks were received.

At this stage the train came in, and after the usual bustle of securing places—in which emergency a little masculine help is not to be lightly disregarded—Matilda found herself seated beside a young gentleman whose profile she could not help furtively admiring, even if his conduct met with her very conventional disapproval.

For a distinct coolness, you see, still existed.

But it was a two hours' run from the Junction to the City—and much may happen in two hours.

Bob's arms were around her and she heard him say: "Bear up, little girl; we'll have you out in no time."

11.

THE band was blaring a recent "victory air." The Performing Seals, the Diving Beauties, the Weight Lifting Champion, all were earning a large and enthusiastic following. On the many mechanical thrills provided by a far-sighted management for a sensation-loving public the afternoon's business was in full and profitable swing. Student cries of peanut vendors and side-show proprietors vied with other noise in creating a joyful pandemonium of sound. Wonderland Park was enjoying the popularity that perfect June weather made possible.

"It's all been so perfectly gorgeous, Bob!"

Matilda's radiant face as she looked up at her escort gave ample confirmation to her words.

A delightful lunch at a roof garden restaurant, a breezy train ride to the Park, and a long afternoon's enjoyment of the thrills of Scenic Railway, and Mysterious Maze, and Victory Whirl, and countless other attractions, had seemed like a wonderful dream to a girl just freed from the restraints of a rather exclusive and old-fashioned College for Young Ladies."

In spite of misgivings aplenty and a reproving conscience that would not be lulled into absolute quiet, Matilda looked back and knew she would do the same again if she had the chance. Not with anyone, you know, but then Bob was—so different. He had planned it all on the train, and it was such an alluring prospect of an innocent but venturesome afternoon's fun that she could not resist it. The fact that she was a day earlier than expected in leaving for home, and had sent no word so that her coming might be a surprise, made detection unlikely. She could take a taxi out to the suburb of Westwood, where her home was, just as though she had arrived on the evening train. Not that she would descend to a deliberate untruth, you know, but if, as was extremely likely, no questions were asked—why! So she argued and almost convinced herself.

"You've really had a good time, Matilda?"

"Ever so good."

"Count me in on that, too," he said with boyish enthusiasm. "I've never had a better. But then," he added quickly, "you see I never had you along before. That counts for a lot."

"Honest?"

"Cross my heart!" he said gaily.

"I'm so glad," she said simply, and meant it.

The afternoon wore on, the sun dipped lower, and still they lingered. A delightful paddle on the artificial lake and winding little stream that led through leafy woodland glades claimed the best part of an hour. Contentment, and with it an understanding silence, fell upon them.

Finally Matilda broke it.

"I'm afraid it's getting late, and I must be going."

He consulted his watch.

"Great life!" he exclaimed. "It's nearly six."

"Oh, Bob!"—in sudden alarm—"You must get me a taxi and send me home. It's a long way to go, and I have my luggage to pick up at the check room."

"Not so fast, little girl. You don't suppose I've found you just to lose you. Look," he pleaded, "let's go in the Mysterious Maze again as a finale—it's quietest in there, and there are some things I want to tell you—and you me."

Matilda hesitated.

"You'll get me that taxi right away afterwards. Promise."

"I promise."

The transition was soon made from the canoe to the Mysterious Maze with its queer little "boats-for-two" that were carried by the force of a silent stream through narrow tunnels, with strange and grotesque grottoes where weird carvings and paintings alternated with pleasing and unexpected vistas.

"I adore this," confided Matilda, clinging a little more tightly to Bob's arm. "It's so spooky."

"I'm more interested in you than in 'spooks,'" he laughed, then, more seriously: "Matilda, I've tried to give you a good time this afternoon—now do you think you could do two things for me?"

She looked up, eyes big with wonderment at his serious tone. Her words came very softly:

"I'll try."

"Well, first," he commenced, "I want you to promise me you'll never run off this way with a strange young man again. It's all wrong!"

Matilda stared.

"Well, I like that," she declared, pouting. "Who was it told me it was all right?"

"Um—did I? Well, it isn't done in the best circles, little girl. In fact, it's a pretty direct route to trouble. This time you happened to draw a chap who tries to be a bit of a gentleman, even if he is an irresponsible ass—"

"Bob!"

"It's true. It was all my fault. I had no business leading you into this. Promise me—never again."

Matilda promised.

Bob visibly brightened.

"Good," he said. "Now my conscience is easier. But do you know the real reason why I asked you this?"

Matilda looked her question.

"Because I'm beginning to find out how much I like you, little girl."

Intervened a short silence.

"And the other thing you wish me to do?" Matilda's voice was a trifle shaky.

"To tell me more of yourself and your home. You have to go soon, and I want to know—more."

"Well, as I told you," she began demurely, "my name is Matilda, kind sir, and I am just seventeen—or rather I will be to-morrow. My big sister has planned a dance for me to-morrow night."

I'm fearfully excited about it. And then I'm so excited, too, about meeting her young man. He's not long back from the war, and I've never seen him, but they say he's fearfully nice. She seems to think so, anyway. Don't you think it will be tremendously exciting?"

The young man nodded in a detached kind of way, regarding her with curious eyes.

"You haven't told me what your surname is, or where you live," he said quickly.

"Oh, how funny. I forgot all about those details. My full name is Matilda Gartshore, and I live—"

"At 26 Avenue Road, Westwood," he finished.

"That's right," she assented; then in sudden realization of the significance of his words—"But how in the world did you know?"

But Bob did not answer her. He was talking rather to himself.

"Good Lord!" she heard him say. "Isn't that a heck of a stunt? What in the world will they think of me if they find I've been doing this Romeo stuff with the youngest member?"

At this point Matilda sat up very straight and asserted herself.

"You're a nasty person," she assured him. "If you're more interested in talking to yourself like a crazy man than to me, why I—I d-don't care, that's all."

He took her hand in his and looked squarely into her face. A whimsical smile played about his mouth.

"Matilda," he said, "here's a pretty kettle of fish. Here am I running around the country with you without even a proper introduction to plead—"

"Well, silly, I'll forgive you."

"Um—yes. Thanks. But your family might not be so generous. And you see I know your family rather well, and I'd hate to get in Dutch with them."

"Oh, then you and I really are sort of acquainted."

He gave a short laugh, and inquired:

"Do you know what my name is?"

"Bob, of course."

"Yes. Bob is the first. And the second is Purnell."

It took Matilda something like fifteen seconds to piece the evidence together. Then she gave a muffled shriek. Purnell! Why, that was the name of her sister's fiance. A sudden rage shook her.

"I hate you!" she sobbed. "I hate you! Take me out of here at once. I want to go home."

PROBABLY any other kind of diversion would have been welcome to Purnell just then. But it came in a very unwelcome form. From the tunnel out of which they had just passed issued shrieks and cries of alarm. Purnell gripped the side of the grotto and held the boat that he might the better listen. The cries grew in volume. Presently, out of the dim mouth of the tunnel came another boat. In it were a couple, with blanched faces, the girl tremblingly clinging to her escort.

The man replied to Purnell's unspoken question.

"Get out quick," he said. "The place is on fire."

"Good Lord!" ejaculated Bob. "It's only made of cardboard."

The other nodded.

"Fire's behind us. Beat it ahead as fast as you can."

In spite of every effort to expedite the passage of the boats, progress was slow. Trembling with excitement more than fear, Matilda did her best to help. Her hands bled from gripping the rough plaster sides of the tunnels through which they passed. But through it all the strange ache that came with the shattering of her first real romance, persisted.

The choking fumes were close upon them now, and every breath was painful. Even the crackling of the flames could be heard and at times little tongues seemed to follow behind them.

Suddenly Matilda gave a startled cry.

"Look, Bob, look!"

Right ahead through the final tunnel leading to the exit smoke began to issue. Even as they looked the hungry flames leaped out and licked at the flimsy fabric of the structure.

Matilda felt her head reeling. Strange shapes danced before her eyes. Bob's arms were round her now, and dimly, as from a great distance, she heard him say: "Bear up, little girl, and we'll have you out in no time." An agony of suffocation overtook her. Then merciful unconsciousness brought release from suffering—and peace.

III.

MATILDA awoke to a sense of luxurious content physically, but with a vague ache in her heart. She turned lazily in bed and watched the notes in the radiant stream of sunshine that poured in through the window. The cuckoo clock on the stairs below informed her musically that it was twelve o'clock.

Then memory began to reconstruct the nightmare that represented the eighteen hours since six last evening. In a vague way Matilda remembered regaining a measure of consciousness and of seeing dim faces over her. That must have been when they were bringing her home—probably in an ambulance. More recent memories told of the anguished confusion of her home, and of her wan effort to smile at her mother and those who gathered around her and tended her with hands made gentle by love. And then came a seemingly endless period when phantoms haunted her sleep, and fear and joy, and grief and pain, came to her.

Soon these gave place to earlier memories, and the events of yesterday before the ghastly ending were marshalled up and reviewed in every blissful detail. Those hours at least had been hers, and nothing could take them from her. They were her rosary. And always at the end there was the memory—the last she really remembered clearly —when he had taken her in his arms to shield her from the coming flames.

A tray of delicacies borne by her mother interrupted her reveries. It was the beginning of many loving attentions. Her brothers came with brusque protestations of affection and a wealth of unsuitable reading matter. The baby proffered a Teddy Bear and an emaciated rag doll, which, being cherished possessions, resembled the widow's mite. Her father had gone to business, but left his love—which was very comforting when one was so conscious of meriting a scolding.

But it was her sister who brought the best of all—a huge bunch of American Beauty roses.

"Oh, Gladys, how lovely. Who sent them?"

"Bob, of course." Gladys kissed her gently.

"Don't you think you're a fortunate little girl?" Matilda smiled wanly.

"I wonder," she said. "Gladys, dear, let me see the morning paper. Roy says there's a big piece about the—fire."

"If you think you can stand reading it." Matilda nodded assurance, and Gladys sent Roy for it.

"Here it is, Sis." Matilda took it and read, in glaring headlines:

DISASTER AT WONDERLAND PARK
Ten Lives Lost When Mysterious Maze Takes Fire—Heroic Rescue of Three by War Hero.

Followed a vivid account of the disaster and a glowing tribute to the well-known young broker, recently returned from the front—where he had won several decorations—and who with self-sacrificing heroism had rescued two young ladies and a man by soaking their clothes in the stream and forcing a way for them through an aperture in a wall of the last tunnel, and which was designed to give a fleeting vista of the artificial lake and stream below. Mr. Purnell, the account added, was slightly burned about the face and arms, but was otherwise uninjured. "When interviewed he smilingly declined to make any statement for publication beyond the main facts given above."

"Then he wasn't hurt," Matilda cried, in relief. "I was so afraid. Oh, Gladys, you must be so proud of him." Her smile was rather wistful.

"I am," declared her sister, "although I told Jack he would have to give him a good talking to. It was perfectly scandalous the way he carried on with you. I'm glad Jack isn't built that way. It's so frightfully irresponsible!"

"Jack?" Matilda puckered her brows. "Who's Jack?"

"Who's Jack?" repeated Gladys, in surprise. "Why, Bob's big brother, and incidentally, dear, the young gentleman who gave me this."

Matilda's astonished eyes focused on the glittering gem that sparkled in the sunlight as Gladys held up her left hand. Then her lithe young form rose up from the bed and enfolded her sister in a crushing embrace.

"Oh, Gladys," she cried, hugging her ecstatically, "you're the dearest big sister in the world." And proceeded to burst into tears.

Gladys stared in mystification.

"Well," she said presently, "if you aren't the funniest little kitten. But there, you're all tired out, and must promise me you'll get right back into bed and take a long sleep. No wonder, too, after such experiences. What you need is lots of sleep. Climb in." Gladys was intensely practical, you see.

Matilda complied by climbing back under the clothes, and Gladys tiptoed from the room. But the little girl in the bed knew she did not need sleep—she just wanted to think—and think—and dream, with eyes wide open and shining with a wonderful radiance through her tears.

IV.

WHEN one is seventeen and full of romance, and when one simply adores dancing and a dance is proceeding downstairs; further, when it is one's birthday and the dance was originally designed to celebrate the event, it is rather horrible to remain in bed and be barred from it all by supposed physical disabilities. Add to this the knowledge that the Only Man is down there dancing, and the situation becomes clearly impossible.

Matilda knew it to be so, and proceeded to act in accordance with her convictions. Very quietly, having watched her chance, she dressed in her favorite frock and stole downstairs.

The strains of a dreamy waltz were just commencing when she found him—sitting out in the conservatory in splendid isolation. She crept up behind, and whispered:

"Why so grumpy?"

He looked up and smiled—that wonderful smile that had held her from the first.

"Make it past tense and I'll agree with you—I was feeling grumpy. But I'm not now. Matilda, dear, I won't feel right until I know if you meant what you said last night just before—it happened. Do you remember, Matilda? You said, 'I hate you.' That's got to be changed or I shall—go grumpy again!"

But Matilda's eyes were downcast, and her cheeks a little more rosy than usual. When she did not speak, he said quietly:

"Do you know what they're playing, Matilda?"

She looked up quickly.

"It's from the 'Maid of the Mountains,' isn't it. Bob?"

"Yes—listen." Softly he ran over the last two lines:

"Love holds the key to set me free.

And love will find a way."

"Matty, dear, that's the key that has to be used—and only you can use it. Last night you said to me, 'I hate you.' Don't you think you could find a substitute for the middle word? It's such a pretty sentence—I'd like to hear you say it."

And, very softly, Matilda said it.

A Story of How "Cyclone Bill" Became An Ally of the Salvation Army

THE WILDERNESS THAT BLOSSOMED

By VIRNA SHEARD

$25.00

ILLUSTRATED BY E. J. DINSMORE

IT was the end of the day and Cyclone Bill was glad of it. With the going down of the sun, the earth would cool off a little, and he could start back for the ranch. He stood leaning against the gaudily painted door-frame of the one hotel the town boasted, and he gazed with apparent indolent indifference down the long dusty main street, dotted irregularly with its small adobe houses and shops.

In his grey eyes beneath their sleepily drooping lids, there smouldered a red light, like the glow left in the heart of the ashes when a fire has burned down.

And the red light smouldered with reason—

He had ridden over from his ranch twelve miles south of this Arizona town, in the dew of the morning, driving before him twenty unwilling, half-wild steers; and he had had his journey for nothing. The man who had bargained to buy his stock had failed to appear at the appointed meeting place, and neither was there word nor sign from him.

All day Cyclone Bill had waited about the dull hotel in a wordless impatience that was peculiar to him. The trains that ran into the rough nearby station, long hours apart, broke the monotony somewhat, and kept his expectancy alive, but only one passenger alighted from them, and he was not the right man. Now in the very late afternoon the ranchman still watched the road through the heat quivering up from it, and occasionally flicked the white dust from his long boots with his riding crop.

A dazzling blue butterfly fluttered up and around a clump of holly-hocks by the painted door, and the sunlight seemingly turned its wings into blue flames. It sifted through the red silken bells and lit them so they looked like little temple lamps.

If the man noticed the exquisite play of color, at least he did not appear to.

Men passed to whom he nodded, and two girls, in ruffled muslin dresses went by—and after a little—went by again, one looking at him boldly from beautiful daring brown eyes, and the other shyly from under long curled lashes. Pretty girls, both of them. Apparently he did not see them either. They were one with the butterfly and the sun-kissed holly-hocks.

He was a picturesque figure himself though his years had been enough to whiten his hair a bit at the temples.

As for his name, it had just come to belong to him, as is the way with some names. There were those who said he had earned it by being the only living man left when a cyclone passed a certain corner of the country where he happened to be. There were others again, who maintained that his temper when it blew up was akin to any cyclone that ever tore things loose; and still others held that it was but a free Western pronunciation of some mellow foreign name.

No one troubled to investigate farther. There were half-breeds and Apache Indians thereabouts, who knew him and loved him not, but the cowboys upon his own great ranch, although they feared him with a fear mingled with awe, also worshipped him, in secret, and afar off. Of this he took no visible note. He was sternly fair to all, but showed no favors to any. He raised his cattle; branded them; sold them, and steadily banked his money. None asked to what end, or knew.

The sun was going down now like a red-hot wheel rolling through a mist of gold. Cyclone Bill still flicked his boots as though it were his sole occupation in life, but there had come a tenseness in the grip he had of his crop; and he still watched the road.

Then, up the centre of it, afar off, and heralded by a cloud of amber dust, the rolling of little drums and jingling of tambourines, came a motley procession of travel-worn people. They were singing music that was plainly hymn music and keeping step with it to some indifferent extent.

There was a faint flavor of the martial about it, albeit they sang a song of peace.

The man glanced down the road at them—then gave a short laugh, and pushed back his sombrero.

"Gad!" he said to himself, "you can't escape 'em:—not though you take the wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost. Some man of heaven is bound to come along with a dozen sermons as dry as jerked buffalo meat in his pocket, and he'll tackle your soul or die. If he fails to get on your trail, you can trust these salvation soldiers to find it. Sure thing. There they come filled up with exhortations. Petticoats too!" he went on. "A regular round-up. If it were not for the petticoats I'd like to fire a blank cartridge into the middle of the lot, to see if their nerve would hold. I reckon they'd jest run like jack rabbits, and leave all their holy paraphernalia behind."

The wrath that had been gathering in Cyclone Bill's soul all day was slowly concentrating and it seemed it might fall now, not upon the deserving object, but on the harmless, dusty singers struggling onward towards the little town, their refuge and hope for the night.

The words of the hymn came quite clearly now:—

"Wind and storm will soon be over,
Then we'll anchor in the Hallelujah harbour,
We are out upon an ocean sailing—
To our home beyond the tide.
To our home beyond the tide."

"Got the damn metaphor ideas mixed," said Cyclone Bill softly, smiling a little. "Can't stick to their own line—army work, bloody battlefields and the like, in their hymns, but they must tackle the sea. 'Out upon an ocean sailing'—sailing. Think of it! The everlasting blue of the water, or the everlasting cool gray-green of it.

The sea-gulls' silver wings; the salt wind in your face, the irony of it against this sun-hardened country aching for rain, the brittle parched grasses, the dust like fine ashes. They might have scared up some other form of torture. But no, they must conjure up the eternal mirage of the desert."

People had come to the doors of their low white houses, and from here, and there and everywhere in the town, gathered to watch and follow the band of the Salvation Army, and the few tired musicians, for they were starved for melody of any kind.

When the singers reached the little hotel, they stopped and swung into a half-circle. There were eight or nine women with soft, earnest faces, and jaded and out-wearied bodies—for they were walking from town to town—and a dozen or more men, some almost old, and with a light of high fervor in their eyes, and some young, and gravely determined and set of face.

All the women carried fiercely mottoed flags or tambourines, and they wore the blue gown of coarse serge uncompromisingly ugly in design, and the unspeakably awful blue bonnet that is of their order.

At the end of the line of women was a girl of about twenty. She also wore the serge gown and the straw bonnet, but even to the ranch-man's eyes she wore them with a difference.

The bonnet had slipped back from the wavy bronze of her hair and the blue strings alone held it from falling.

Her face was of a lovely oval, and beneath her eyes, blacklashed and grey, there were shadows that bespoke utter weariness.

Cyclone Bill leaned forward a little to watch her, while one of the band, an old bright-eyed man, spoke to the people. All that he said they had heard many times before. It was as old as the sound of the dropping of rain. Just the Gospel of Christ, only that. They listened, but heeded not. It was the music they wanted, the sound of uplifted voices, of brassy bugle and rattling drum. They would not give attention to the earnest, patient preacher.

SEEING this, a middle-aged, thick-set fellow, wearing the uniform of a Captain, and from his head to his feet, of the type that is of the earth, earthy, stepped to the front and silenced the elderly speaker with a curt nod.

"I will talk, brother!" he said, "I will tell them. They will not hear the Gospel as you give it, then let them listen to me. I have no fear, and I will tell them of Life, Death, and Judgment to come."

So he did. Far and near echoed the deep baritone of his rolling voice. With both his strong arms he sawed the air and he ranted loudly of this life and the life that follows. No doubts assailed him. Heaven, he regarded as a place of literally golden streets, and he spoke of the pearly gates as swinging to and fro, directly above the blue over-head, as indeed they may. As for Hell, he pictured it as the lurid pit of our early imagination, the place cherished of our Puritan forefathers and not allowed banishment from any creed or pamphlet of their day.

Yet while he dwelt but sparingly upon the joys of the saved and blessed, no detail of the sorrows of the lost escaped him.

Whatever else this man lacked, he had the gift of words, and though in a coarse, uneducated tongue, he created a picture of the lost soul, so vivid, so terrible, that he stamped it upon the minds of the listeners as an indelible impression, a thing to haunt and endlessly trouble the night. Not so had spoken

"But you cannot really mean that," she commenced, doubtfully. "Oh! it is too strange."

the old soldier of the Gospel, but men and women had not listened. Now they did.

A half-caste Mexican girl, shivered, and turned pale beneath her brown skin. Children caught at their mothers' skirts and mothers lifted their babies closer against their beating hearts.

Then as suddenly as he had begun his harangue, the Captain broke out with song. The words streamed forth like the heat wave from a furnace, and his voice was beautiful and strong.

"There is a death whose pang
Outlasts the fleeting breath—
Oh! what eternal horrors hang Around that second death!"

A low moan ran through the bonneted women, as they unwillingly took up the refrain, and sang the verse after him in answer to his command. Not so would they have sung, yet even as Trilby, they obeyed the force of a personality.

Only the girl at the end of the line did not join.

She stood still, her grey eyes staring with child-like fear, out of her white face, her free bright hair tossed back from her forehead.

Evidently this outburst of the Salvation Army Captain was an unusual thing. He had startled even his own followers.

As the voices went into silence and the bitter hymn died away, a little tremor shook her slender body and she sprang forward and grasped the man's arm, holding it with both her hands.

"Oh!" she panted. "What made you sing that verse? See! you have frightened them, you a teacher of Christ! You have frightened even the children! They are clinging to their mothers' gowns, and their lips are quivering, poor babies! That dreadful verse! These are the verses you should have sung!"

Throwing back her head as a bird will, she took up the old melody and sang with the intensity of her passionate youth the two following verses of the same hymn:—

"This world can never give,
The bliss for which we sigh,
'Tis not the whole of Life to live,
Nor all of Death to die.

"Beyond this vale of tears
There is Life above,
Unmeasured by the flight of years—
And all that Life is Love!"

Her voice rang out across the stillness, sweet and comforting as an angel's.

The Mexican girl drew a quick sobbing breath, and Cyclone Bill bit a word short off between his teeth.

The thick-set Salvation Army Captain drew the girl back into her place in the little circle and she stood trembling but quiet now that the sudden impulse to song and action was over.

"That's right enough—right enough, my girl," he said, half-sullenly, "but there must be conviction of sin. Confession to God and repentance. Ay! turning to the crowd—"Repentance! or the worm that dieth not! Harder it is to enter the Kingdom of Heaven than for a camel to go through the eye of a needle! Yet great is His mercy! None who repent will He forsake!"

Then noticing the light failing and the people going away he beckoned to the girl hastily, "Strike up again, Nora!" he said, "Sing, 'Marching to Victory,' to the old tune 'Tenting To-night!'" After that Sanctified Sam will give them his experience. Sanctified Sam, who was raised from the depths! Sing! Sing! my girl. Don't wait."

The girl shook her head as though uncertain what to do and the people wavered. In their hearts, they longed for the song, and the music of her voice.

The captain realized the situation.

"Do as I tell you," he cried softly, catching her arm. "We've got their attention and I want to keep it. We may not get them together again, once they scatter. Do as I tell you, sing!"

"No," she said with a certain quick defiance. "No, I will not sing again to-night. I could not sing again as I did a moment ago—so do not ask me to."

The grip on her arm tightened, tightened visibly, while the color flew into her face and then slowly ebbd. The man's eyes, red and angry, stared into hers, that were fearless but troubled.

A frail woman next the girl pushed between them.

"Please, Nora," she said gently, pleadingly. "Don't refuse him, love."

The captain brushed her aside. "You need not interfere," he commented sharply. "I can persuade her alone."

The girl lifted her eyes, and by some chance, they looked straight into Cyclone Bill's, dusky beneath the brim of his wide hat.

It was as though she had set a spark to a powder train.

In two long strides the ranchman reached the captain who still held her arm in his strong grasp, and catching him by the shoulders, he loosened his hold, and then swayed him gently to and fro.

The man had no time to resent the action before Cyclone Bill began to speak.

"Look a' here, Stranger," he said slowly, "I respect the cloth, black, with white choker, or blue with red bands and brass buttons. Yes, and I respect the Salvation Army much as I do the Church, though I don't wear the brand of neither. But you are a little off color. You ain't genuine, somehow. You ain't the kind of game we shoot out here though. No. But I reckon there's some kind of punishment coming to you right soon for your own good too. The rest of your bunch is round pegs in round holes. But you don't fit, presume likely you come out this way to scare us into being holy—what? Well, we don't scare easy, most of us. Still there's women an' children hereabouts mightn't sleep so sound at nights after listening to your idea of the Gospel. So you can leave it to the others to preach. It's up to me to see that you do."

"Now," he drew away a pace, "if you can hit me, I give you a fair chance. Take it or leave it, but take it quick. If not," then there was a perceptible pause—"if not, it'll be my turn."

Before the captain had taken advantage of the situation, or decided on a course of action, a lightning-swift blow caught him.

He succumbed without any attempt at defence, and the small company, utterly amazed, weary and unstrung, surrounded him with mingled words of surprise and terror.

THE girl who had sung, gave a little cry and then slipped away quickly into the shadow of the vine-wreathed hotel verandah, where it turned at the side of the house.

She stood there alone, a slim, dark figure, as Cyclone Bill swung by a moment later. He passed her, then turned on his heel and came back.

Where they stood it was twilight and still. Again his eyes, half-smiling, half dare-devil and bold, drew her shadowy, frightened gray ones up to them.

"Roll up your sleeve," he said, touching her arm slightly. "This one, the left arm."

"No! No!" she cried below her breath. "I will not! I will not! It does not matter, or concern you at all."

From around the corner of the hotel came the sound of the little Salvation band marching in disorganized array through the gaily painted portico into the main room, where supper was being served.

The ranchman listened until the last footstep passed. "Do you want me to roll it up?" he said, bending towards her. "I reckon there was some cause for what I gave that chap, and I'd like to see how much."

In Solitude

By Virna Sheard.

He is not desolate whose ship is sailing
Over the mystery of an unknown sea,
For some great love with faithfulness unfailing
Will light the stars to bear him company.

Out in the silence of the mountain passes,
The heart makes peace and liberty its own—
The wind that blows across the scented grasses
Bringing the balm of sleep—comes not alone.

Beneath the vast illimitable spaces
Where God has set His jewels in array,
A man may pitch his tent in desert places
Yet know that heaven is not so far away.

But in the city—in the lighted city—
Where gilded spires point toward the sky,
And fluttering rags and hunger ask for pity,
Grey Loneliness in cloth-of-gold, goes by.

She shook her head, but began slowly to roll back the blue serge sleeve.

Above the elbow, white and dimpled, there were the marks of four heavy fingers.

"So!" he said, "I knew he hurt you."

With one hand he helped her pull down the sleeve.

The girl drew back, a flame of color sweeping her face.

"It does not matter," she repeated. "It is nothing—nothing at all to you sir, anyway. We are strangers."

"You're wrong there," he replied softly. "Some folks are never strangers. It's queer, but mighty true."

Then, with a nod towards the lighted rooms of the little hotel, "Do they stop here over-night?"

"Yes," she nodded. "We are tired. We walked over from the town beyond. To-morrow there will be a parade with the band, and a revival."

"To-morrow," he echoed reflectively. "To-morrow, eh?"

"Yes," she returned, "that is the plan;—and—I must go now, sir."

Cyclone Bill did not seem to hear, though he was looking intently into the lovely face.

"Who is he?" he asked, "the sky-pilot who talked."

"He is my step-father," answered the girl,—"and that little woman—the one who ran to him—is my mother."

The ranchman gave a soft whistle. "So!" he exclaimed, "I see it. He was in the Army when your mother married him; then she joined, and you just naturally fell into line. I reckon they corralled you, little one. Sort of took you along before you had any particular religious convictions. What? Isn't that it?"

"Why, yes," she said. "I suppose that is it. But I love to sing the hymns. Some are so beautiful, both words and melodies. You must not think I mind doing what I can to help. What I hate is to march through the streets—to pass the tambourine for money,—to try and speak of my soul. Oh! that I cannot do! But indeed I may be wrong. I do not think I have repented of my sins enough, or that I am conscious of a change of heart like all the others."

Across the bronzed face above her there passed a sudden soft expression.

"Your sins? Your sins? eh?" said the ranchman, smiling questioningly.

"Yes," she nodded.

"Listen," he said, "There's a moon to-night. It will rise in half an hour, and roll up the sky like a big golden ball. When it gets high it will turn to silver. Down that way yonder,—there's a long double line of cotton-wood trees. You just go down this street and turn to the right. I'll be there when it strikes nine. Yes, I'll be there sure. You'll come, eh?"

The girl lifted her face to his and her eyes were held as by a spell. "Oh, I cannot! I cannot!" she cried. "You know I cannot. I should be within, and with the others now. They will miss me, my mother will be frightened,"—she stopped breathlessly—"Oh do you not understand?—I could not go."

Cyclone Bill glanced up at the sky.

"There ain't going to be a cloud," he went on as to himself, "an' the moon is at the full. I reckon it will be mighty pretty down there. I've heard a Virginia nightingale or a redwing in those cotton-woods once or twice, long about this time o' year. The light chequers down through the leaves an' makes shadows like lace on the ground; velvet-black, and silver-white it looks. There's a kind of rose bush grows low down under some of those trees, an' the blossoms smell sweet when the dew falls. Inside the house here it will be quite some full of people. Maybe they'll tune up and have a meeting of some sort. The rooms are sun-baked and hot, but down there by the old cotton-woods,"—he broke off—

The girl caught a quick breath—"I'll come," she answered. Cyclone Bill straightened his shoulders and lifted his hat.

"I sort of reckoned you would maybe," he returned, "though I wasn't jest certain." So with a backward smile he strode away.

She gazed after him a moment, then rounded the corner of the house, and fleetly followed the way of the others, joining them at the supper table, unnoticed.

The ranchman and the katydids had the cotton-woods almost to themselves. The bird of night had not yet started his song up to the roses. Now and then a bat flitted by or a white owl boomed across the dark on muffled wing. The moon came up the sky majestically and the world was touched with a silver frosting, from its light.

The man leaned against the grey trunk of the last tree, and watched from his vantage the corner of the street that ran on to the small hotel illuminated now for the night.

"One way and another," he soliloquized, "I've been watching all day. But this—this, I reckon, is some different."

SUDDENLY he leaned forward eagerly for down the side street from shadow to shadow came the figure of a girl moving lightly, swiftly towards him.

As she neared the trees, the mellow, wonderful first notes of a bird sounded from among the leaves above, and the ranchman stepped out to meet her.

"I've got 'em all here for you," he said, "the moon's celestial highness—the scent of little low roses. The bird singing overhead there, and the blessed cool stillness. Do you like it, eh?"

She did not answer but went by his side along the moonlit way.

"Some days are powerful hard to live through," Cyclone Bill continued, "and there are things about this one I'd like to tell you, and tell you right now."

"Do you know, I've been waiting around this God-forsaken town since sun-up for a man who was to have bought some cattle I drove over from my ranch. He fooled me once before, this same fellow, and he lied his way out that time, but the man don't live who can do that twice with Cyclone Bill. Believe me. That's why I waited. Well, he didn't turn up. He will sometime, but he didn't to-day. It's eternally lucky for him he didn't turn up near sundown." He stopped a moment, then went on. "When that Salvation Army round-up came on the scene I had something as near to murder in my heart—well as near as they make it."

The girl lifted her face to his—listening.

"Then," he went on, "then I saw you, and on the instant the thought that had had possession of me, body and soul, slipped away into nothingness, into thin air. Just suddenly you were the only thing that counted between the two seas. The only thing. After a bit I sort of caught on to the words that human volcano was giving forth. The brimstone and fire rolled down to where I was, and I listened quiet enough, while he sang his song. Then you followed with the other two verses, that put out the fire of his,—and whether it was your voice, or the eyes of you, or your courage for it, or jest that I am I, and you are you, it came to me right quick that you were mine, belonged to me of right; a heaven-sent conviction." His voice cool and steady, had gone from sentence to sentence swiftly, but with an occasional pause. Now it stopped.

"But you cannot really mean that," she commented doubtfully. "Oh, it is too strange! Why you do not know me at all! Yes, I remember what you said, but we are strangers nevertheless. I ought not to have come here, I ought not yet it is so lovely out of doors, so heavenly, and I wanted to see you."

THE THIRD ARTICLE

THE writer on "Home Training in Cabinet Work," has views regarding the value of this work in keeping with the most advanced ideas of to-day on technical training:

"The restless activity of the growing boy, whatever his grade in life, or however fortunate his surroundings, is a normal expression of his nature. Upon the direction of this activity during the formative years of his life depends the success or failure of his future career and the measure of his coming usefulness as a citizen. As the writer states, the mere inculcation of principles of right and wrong does not necessarily lead to right living and right doing. Ethical theorizing is an easy matter, but before precepts and theories can be made objective as the mainspring of habitual right action, the element of a sturdy resolution to achieve must be built into the developing character by the habits of daily life. And to me it would seem that nothing is clearer than that 'the direct contact with Nature's forms and forces leaves an impress upon the soul of the worker.'"

"Honest work has never yet degraded man or boy, and when an over-indulgent parent encourages in a child the false notion that he has no need to work with his hands, that parent is trifling in dangerous fashion with forces as strong as Fate in shaping life for good or ill.

"The natural, instinctive pride of a boy in being able to do something needs only to be directed into some channel adapted more or less to his tendencies and capabilities, to furnish a right and healthful outlet for the energies that work so much mischief when wrongly applied. It is just here that manual training, and especially skill in wood-working, can be made to carry an almost irresistible appeal to the boy in the home, as something that he can learn to do, and to do well, if given the opportunity, tools and materials.

"The cost of an outfit, as stated in the foregoing articles of this series, is trifling as compared with its importance as a factor in moral and mental development, and as a means to the self-discipline that alone ensures stability in character-building."

The fondness of the small boy for whittling is merely an indication of what Nature intended him to do. Destructive tendencies are developed only where there is no one wise enough to direct the boy's energies into constructive channels. Work in wood has always afforded a healthy field for human activity—and even when it takes the primitive form of felling the tree which is to be used in cabinet work, it has an attraction for healthy humanity. Thus we find Mr. Gladstone turning to the forest when the cares of statesmanship became too heavy and finding relief in cutting down trees and superintending their disposal. The well-known tale of George Washington and the cherry tree merely shows that the future leader of armies was a youth of wholesome activity, who had no intention to destroy the cherry tree but was possessed of a desire to be a worker in wood. Let us hope that those in authority forgave him and presented him with a tool chest, so that he might make a medicine cabinet out of that demolished pride of the orchard.

TAKE note that the side rails of the seat are mortised and tenoned—and the front and back rails are dowelled—thereby pinning the tenon of the side rails. This is likely to be a weak point in a chair, but if constructed as given above it is very strong. All tenons are well glued with warm glue, and the back slats are curved by pressing into shape as shown in an accompanying drawing.

Rest Room Work of Homemakers' Clubs

By ELIZABETH BAILEY PRICE

Miss Brodie $10.00

THERE is no more important work of the Homemakers' Clubs than the establishing of rest rooms. It is the pioneer aim of every club, for not only does this room provide a medium where town and country women meet, where a true community spirit is fostered, but it does a humanitarian work in that it provides a place where tired women shoppers may find relaxation.

From the following reports can be gleaned the details of three rest rooms that have been established by the Homemakers' Clubs in Wilcox, Consul and Nokomis. These reports chronicle also other important work taken up by the Homemakers' Clubs. Following is an account of the work of the Wilcox Good Cheer Homemakers' Club:

"We had our first rest room last year. In the discussion of it a number of members of the Grain Growers' Association were present, and they, too, expressed themselves in favor of the idea. It was then decided to raise the initial funds by giving a big dinner on the occasion of meeting of the Grain Growers, when a special speaker was present. Every woman was solicited for donations on the basis that the rest room would be open to all, and with this help the dinner proved a splendid success, netting the sum of over a hundred dollars. The townspeople also provided furnishings, and a very comfortable room is the result. The club considers it costs about $325.00, and the Grain Growers are very helpful in assuming a part of the responsibility of the upkeep of it.

"There are no women on the school board, but Wilcox is building a school-house this summer, and the school lunch will be instituted.

"Our club has found it a very good scheme to have a Thanksgiving Offering of $2 from each member, and each one is supposed to earn it herself, and in this way we are doing all we can to spread the 'Gospel of the Farm Women's Club.'

"The following is our House-Mother's Prayer: 'Lord, preserve me calm in my spirit, gentle in my commands, and watchful that I speak not unadvisedly with my lips; moderate in my purposes, yielding in my temper, and at the same time steadfast in my principles.'"

CONSUL reports:

"During the months of May, June, July and August, we rented a large room above the general store in this town; it was furnished by one or two of the ladies of the club with their own chairs, carpets, tables, pictures, etc., and made a most comfortable and inviting room, for which we paid six dollars and a half a month. This money we raised by giving a paper ball.

"Some of our club meetings were held in this room, and many women who were not members of our club appreciated having a place where they could rest with their little ones, when in for a day's shopping. Our district is quite a large one, including seven schools, and on those seven school boards, two of them have one woman trustee.

"During the epidemic of the flu, both this year and last, conditions here were the worst possible, neither doctors nor nurses being available, but last year the members of our club took a pledge that they would each do whatever possible in nursing, sending out food, or medicine, if they had any on hand, or assisting in any way possible those sick or needing aid, and the pledge held good, for some of our members did noble work. One member especially, lame and not very strong, went from one home to another doing everything that was to be done. In some cases every one in the family was in bed, and requiring care day and night, and yet this brave little woman held out and proved a great blessing to those sick families.

"We are planning now to gather together for such cases of sickness as I have mentioned, to have on hand a few pillow slips, nightgowns for women and children, hot water bottles, ice bags, clinical thermometers, etc., things needed in a sick room, and have these always in readiness to send out to a home where they may be needed, as we found these things most necessary this winter."

NOKOMIS says:

"We are glad, indeed, to be able to report that we have a rest room and library in our town, Nokomis, and that it has been placed there through the combined efforts of the two Homemakers' Clubs, Wreford and Mount Hope, and the Bannockburn I.O.D.E., all country clubs.

"The urgent need for such a room had long been felt. Consequently, in the spring of 1917, the Mount Hope Club called a meeting inviting the other clubs to send representatives. The project vide an adjoining room in which she might have her dress-making parlors. We were glad to accept this generous offer, and were able to secure two small rooms at a rental of $15 a month. We remained here for about two months, then found much better location, three good-sized rooms at the same rental.

"Each club chose two of the members to act as their representatives, which was termed the Rest Room Board. They were elected for two years, one from each club retiring each year, and new members appointed. Articles of agreement were drawn up and a simple constitution and by-laws arranged, giving this board control of the rooms.

"Each club at the start gave $10 from its own treasury, then all combined and gave a bazaar, food sale and tea, raising $175.00. But still we needed more money; it occurred to us that, inasmuch as the municipalities were quite generous with their donations to fat stock shows, etc., they would be more than glad to aid any movement that would add to the comfort of their families. We placed the proposition before the Mount Hope and Wreford municipalities and the town council, asking for yearly grants. The municipalities generously responded, Mount Hope with $100 and Wreford with $80, but the town council could do nothing for us at that time. This year, our expenses being greater, we asked for larger grants, and received $150 from Mount Hope, $100 from Wreford, and the town gave us $50.

"We have a fine library in connection with the rooms. We started this with the $10 grant from the University. We then gave a book shower, receiving a goodly number of nice books. Then each club donated $10, and this laid the foundation. Now we have nearly 500 volumes, with about 100 yearly subscribers.

"We have the books catalogued. We charge $1 a year for library card, and this money is used for more books. The library is greatly appreciated. Difficulties arose for us at the beginning of the year, when Miss Adair found it necessary to give up her work. This necessitated finding a new superintendent, and it has been very hard to find anyone to fill her place. We have the rooms furnished as extensively as funds allow, and they are quite cozy and comfortable.

"We have aspirations for a memorial hall in Nokomis, and hope for a permanent home for our rest room and library there. One of the delightful things in connection with the rooms is the manner in which the board have been able to handle every situation without undue friction or discussion. The rooms are a real blessing, and we wish every town and village might boast of such."

WOMEN'S INSTITUTE GETS DISTRICT NURSE.

ONE of the very big problems that faced the pioneers in the Peace River country, Alberta, was the lack of medical facilities. Only a short time ago there were no nurses, no doctors within sixty miles, no telephone connections, and in the cases of some districts they were located off the mail route, which is the great highway of the automobiles. Women were the chief victims of these circumstances, and many instances of real catastrophes can be cited as the result.

In 1917 the Women's Institutes invaded the north, and the women grouped together turned their first attention to this great problem. Doctors could not be had because of the war and the shortage of them, but the women began to agitate for district nurses with obstetrical training—women who could go to these outlying districts and be of inestimable value to those living there.

After the 1919 Alberta Women's Institute convention, where the late Hon. A. G. MacKay, Alberta's Minister of Public Health, was one of the speakers, the delegates from Peace River approached him, explained the situation and asked for district nurses.

Characteristic of his human grasp of situations, the late Minister saw the problem at once, and promised then if was thoroughly discussed; all were unanimous in wanting the room, but the difficulty lay in getting someone to care for and superintend the room. This difficulty was removed when Miss Adair, a lady especially adapted for such a position, volunteered to act as superintendent if we would pro-

OF INTEREST TO INSTITUTE MEMBERS

There is a revived interest in an "art" of the past—the making of samplers—which is resulting in many an old sampler being given an impressive setting in a frame.

We wish to secure photographs of these, and for this purpose are offering a prize of fifteen dollars for the best photograph of an old-time sampler, with its story—the latter not to exceed eight hundred words.

We also wish to have photographs of historic or unusual quilts, with story attached—limit of eight hundred words in length. Prize, fifteen dollars.

Photographs and stories must be sent by November 1st, 1920. Competitors must be subscribers to this journal and also members of the Women's Institute. Mention branch of Institute when writing. The stories should be written on one side of the paper. Photographs will not be returned. Address "Institutes," Canadian Home Journal, 71 Richmond St. W., Toronto.

MY Dear Club Members:
I have read with interest for some time the Journal Juniors' Club page, and feel that we are not altogether strangers. The many prize stories, poems and drawings which have appeared from month to month make me feel that in our working together we can make our page the pride of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

We, the members of our club and myself, welcome Jean E. Liddle as a member. We are so glad you are fond of art and of music, and hope you will be able to enter in the contests which will appear from month to month.

It was a pleasure, Olive Nightingale, to read your letter, and we warmly welcome you as a member to our club. There are no fees to pay.

We are so glad, Phyllis Smith, that you have written us. No, it is not too late to become a member, and we are very pleased to enroll your name as a member of the Journal Juniors' Club. Let us hear from you again.

A new member, V. Gordon H. Stephens, is enrolled, and to him we fortunately for us. At this time of high prices, a great many are of great food value, and grace the tables of the humble homesteader as well as the noted rich.

In all probability we have no water bird so well known as the "Canada goose," or no goose so widely distributed through the country. They are most eagerly looked for in the spring, for their arrival is the sure indication that the backbone of winter has broken. Their familiar honking is heard long before their wavering, black, V-shaped line appears on the horizon. The volume of sound increases, resembling the baying of a pack of hounds, and at last the flock sweep overhead, all following the leadership of one bird, in their journey over their invisible path. Their nest is made of grasses and feathers on marshes or near ponds, and in May or June they lay from four to nine drab-colored eggs. The "Canada goose" is most easily domesticated of any of our water birds.

Among the "grebes," the most frequently known is the "swan grebe," sometimes called the "Western grebe" because of its extremely long, thin neck, extend our heartiest congratulations for winning the prize story.

It will be a great pleasure to hear from any member of the club, and should you know of any boy or girl who would like to compete for the prizes offered, ask him or her to write to me.

With best wishes for the happiest of holidays to all members of the Journal Juniors' Club, I am,

Sincerely your friend,
BERTHA E. GREEN.

PRIZE STORY.

"Canada's Water Birds," by Gordon H. Stephens, age 13 years, Toronto.

ALL over Canada, from coast to coast, we are favored with waterbirds of all kinds, some of which are noted for their great beauty, and

The "Holboell grebe" comes next to the "Western" in size, and is noted for its beautiful breast and for its appearance and firm texture, which have made it much sought after, and in the past it has been used extensively to adorn hats of women, who were ignorant of the wholesale slaughter that was carried on that they might obtain them. The "grebe" makes its nest in decayed rushes, and lays from two to five eggs.

The "loon," or "great northern diver," in form resembles large grebes, but their feet are full-webbed like those of the duck. The loon is very beautifully marked with black and white, with a crescent across the throat and a ring around the neck. All loons have red eyes. Loons are expert in diving and swimming, and are usually found in larger, more open bodies of water than the grebe.

There are many varieties of "gulls." The "herring gull" is widely known, and they sometimes live in colonies of thousands of birds each, and in winter great numbers of them are seen in all the harbors along our sea coast. Young gulls are born covered with down, and can run swiftly and swim well. The "Kittiwake" can easily be identified by their small size, and the tips of their wings and feet are black. They usually keep well out at sea, often hovering around boats to pick up refuse that is thrown overboard.

Many Ways of Cooking Corn

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "THE THRIFT COOK BOOK"

IN selecting corn, that with short, thick ears, green, tender husks and dark silk will be found the best.

To test the condition of the ears bend back the husks and press a kernel with something sharp—the farmer uses his thumb nail. If the milk flows freely the corn is in good condition. Corn, like peas, loses its sweetness after being broken from the stalk, and should not be picked any longer than possible before eating.

Green, sweet corn is one of the most delicious of the garden's products and it may be served in many ways besides plain boiled, or stewed, as is the usual method.

Browned Corn.—Cut the raw corn from the cob by scoring each row and pressing out the pulp with the back of a knife, leaving the hulls on the cob, but getting all the milk. Heat a frying pan piping hot, sprinkle in a little salt, as soon as it browns put the corn from two ears in the pan, pressing the kernels with a spoon so as to extract the milk. In a moment it will begin to brown in its own juice. Keep stirring and when well broiled add a tablespoonful of water at a time and press again until it begins to stick. Add another spoonful of water, and so on until five have been added. This gives a rich yet delicate gravy. Serve very hot.

Green Corn Croquettes.—Mix together one pint each of grated corn and bread crumbs and season to taste with salt, pepper and paprika. Add one egg beaten and mixed with two tablespoonfuls of flour. Mix well and make into outlet shaped croquettes. Brush over with beaten egg, toss in fine bread crumbs and fry in plenty of smoking hot fat. Drain and serve with hot, nicely seasoned white sauce.

Peppers Stuffed with Corn.—A very good filling for peppers is hot cooked corn that has had stirred in with it melted butter, grated cheese, and salt and pepper to season. Allow one tablespoonful of butter and two tablespoonfuls of cheese to each cupful of corn. Choose the sweet peppers for stuffing, and cut off the tops about an inch below the stems. Save these to serve as covers. Throw the peppers into strong salted water for one hour. Drain well and fill with the corn mixture. Replace the tops, place the peppers upright in a greased fireproof dish, add enough hot water or tomato sauce, to baste with and bake for thirty minutes in a hot oven. Serve hot with the sauce poured round.

Corn Fritters.—These are a favorite garnish for roast chicken or hare. To one cupful of fresh sweet corn cut from the ear, allow one-half cupful of cracker crumbs mixed with one-half cupful of milk. Add two well beaten eggs, yolks and whites, whipped separately, and season with salt, pepper and paprika. Drop by spoonfuls on to a hot, well greased griddle and cook for four minutes. Turn and brown on the other side. Serve hot. Another Method.—Beat one egg, add one cupful of corn, one cupful of flour, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of salt oil, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, and one-half cupful of milk. Mix well and drop by spoonfuls into smoking hot fat and and cook for five minutes, then add two cupfuls of fresh corn, one-half teaspoonful of salt, a few grains of paprika and one teaspoonful of sugar.

Bring to boiling point, and divide into the pastry shells. Cover the top with bread crumbs, moistened with four tablespoonfuls of milk or cream, and bake in a hot oven from fifteen to twenty minutes. Two tablespoonfuls of butter may be used instead of the cream.

Succotash.—Boil six ears of green corn until tender, and scrape from the cob. Boil one-half the quantity of lima beans that you have corn until tender. Drain off the water, mix with the corn, season with salt and pepper, add one-half cupful of milk and two tablespoonfuls of butter and cook for ten minutes longer. String beans may be prepared in the same way with corn.

Corn Pudding.—Select fresh ears of corn, medium size, and with a keen bladed knife, score each row of kernels, and scrape out the pulp, leaving the hulls on the cob. To the pulp taken from twelve ears allow three cupfuls of rich milk, four beaten eggs, one teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of white pepper, and if the corn lacks sweetness, two tablespoonfuls of maple syrup. Turn into a deep well greased fireproof dish and bake in a slow, steady oven for two hours and serve hot in the dish in which it was baked.

Boiled Corn.—Remove the outer husks, bend back the fine inner ones, strip off every bit of the silk, and bring the inner husks over the ears. Bind with a husk, put into a kettle, spread the outer husks over the top, cover with cold water and bring to a boil as quickly as possible. Cook only six minutes after coming to the boiling point, as over cooking toughens. Strip off the husks, and serve piping hot. Another nice way to cook tender corn is in milk. In this case, husk the corn and drop into boiling milk. Cook just for five minutes from the time it begins to boil. Keep covered closely while cooking, and serve as soon as done.

Corn Chowder.—To make corn chowder, cold cooked ears of corn may be utilized. Grate or cut from the cob enough to make one quart of corn.

Cut into small pieces one-half pound of bacon or fat salt pork, and cook in a frying pan until brown. Just before it reaches this stage add a medium sized onion chopped fine and browned also. Into a large stewpan place a layer of diced potatoes, sprinkle over some of the browned onion and bacon, then a layer of cut corn with salt, pepper and paprika to season. Next add a layer of potatoes, more bacon, onion and corn, and so on until all the materials have been used, having corn at the top. Add two cupfuls of boiling water, cover the pot and cook gently for thirty minutes. Blend two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour in a saucepan over the fire, add two cupfuls of hot milk, cook until smooth and thick, then add to the chowder with a few crackers broken in small pieces and a sprinkling of parsley.

AUGUST is the month when picnic parties begin to seek the open air and unfamiliar pleasures of the fields and woods. On such excursions the contents of the luncheon basket form one of the most important requisites for the day's delights.

Years and years ago when vacation outings were being planned, it was customary to have a list passed among those who were to furnish the things to eat and drink, and each one picked out the dish she was willing to supply. It was then "nicked" off the list. This form of making and signifying your choice became known as "pick and nick," which soon was changed into picnic and in due time the word picnic was applied to the entertainment.

In place of the old fashioned "picnic dinner" which was much too rich, too plentiful and much too sweet, those who fill the picnic baskets and campers of to-day have substituted luncheon dishes that are wholesome and appetizing.

They have learned the real meaning of the words "vacation" and "picnic" and so, instead of using heavy plate and linen, they use paper or wooden plates, paper or aluminum cups,

It is a mistake not to take pains in setting the picnic table neatly and attractively. Fancy paper tablecloths will be found excellent. A square of white table oilcloth exactly the same size as the cloth will protect the paper from moisture. A paper tablecloth and napkins are not only easy to carry, but may be thrown away after being used, thus saving the trouble of carrying them home after the merry feast.

The simplifying of the picnic repast is due largely to the evolution of the sandwich, which has developed from a thick bun with a slice of meat in it to delicate triangles and rounds of bread with most delicious and appetizing fillings. There seems to be no end to the fillings for sandwiches. Only a very limited imagination will be contented with the old-time ham, chicken and tongue sandwiches.

The bread for sandwiches must not be too fresh, nor must it be too stale to be pleasing to the taste. Bread twelve hours old cuts well, and if thin slices are desired, beaten butter should be spread on the bread before this is cut. Do not melt the butter, but beat it with a wooden spoon, or leave it in a warm room for twenty quite as attractive-looking as they taste.

When lettuce is taken, it may be wrapped in a moistened cloth and it will keep beautifully fresh for several hours. Oiled paper should be wrapped around the cloth to prevent it from drying.

Brown and white bread besides rolls should be included, as they form an important part of the picnic fare. A box or two of crackers should not be forgotten.

Cake and fruit, particularly the latter in abundance, make a palatable finish to an outdoor meal besides satisfying the thirst.

Clean up when the picnic is over. It is a poor return for a pleasant day's outing to mar Nature's beauty by making it hideous with the souvenirs of the meal.

Priscilla Cookies.—Beat three-fourths cupful of butter with one-half cupful of grated maple sugar for five minutes, add two eggs, well beaten and beat again for a few moments then add one-half teaspoonful each of lemon and vanilla extracts, one-half cupful of chopped raisins, three cupfuls of flour sifted with one-eighth teaspoonful of salt and one teaspoonful of baking powder. Knead lightly on a floured baking board, roll out and cut with fancy cutters. Lay on greased baking tins and bake for ten minutes in a moderate oven.

If desired, these cookies may be covered with maple frosting. To make the frosting, boil one cupful of grated maple sugar or maple syrup with one cupful of boiling water until when tested in cold water it forms a soft ball, or 240° F. on a candy thermometer. Pour on to the stiffly beaten white of one egg and continue beating until of the consistency to spread.

Caraway Cakes.—Beat one-half cupful of butter until creamy with one cupful of sugar, add two eggs, well beaten, one-half cupful of milk, two teaspoonfuls of caraway seeds, one and three-fourths cupfuls of cake flour sifted with a pinch of salt and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat well, divide into fifteen greased and floured gem pans, and bake in a moderate oven for fifteen minutes.

Date Bars.—Beat two eggs until thick and lemon colored, add one cupful of grated maple sugar gradually beating all the time, add five tablespoonfuls of flour sifted with one-half teaspoonful of baking powder and a few grains of salt, then add one cupful of chopped nut meats and one cupful of stoned dates cut in small pieces. Spread on greased baking tins seven by ten inches and bake in a moderate oven. When cool cut in bars and wrap in waxed paper.

Salted Walnut Meats.—Crack walnuts keeping the meats whole. Beat up one white of egg slightly, add nut meats and stir until they are entirely coated with egg. Remove nuts from the egg and put in dripping pan; sprinkle with fine salt and bake in a hot oven until the nuts are heated through. Keep the oven door open while baking and stir nuts often that they may not burn. Pack in small boxes.

Chocolate Caramels.—Put one cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of maple syrup, and one and one-half cupfuls of milk into a saucepan, stir until the sugar is thoroughly dissolved, bring to boiling point, and boil until the mixture forms a firm ball, when tested in cold water, or 250° F. on candy forks of aluminum and paper napkins.

Baskets are the most convenient receptacles in which to carry picnic luncheons, they are not heavy in themselves and can be obtained in almost any size and shape, varying from the light oblong plain basket to the automobile hamper that is fitted up with all sorts of conveniences.

Care should be exercised in packing picnic boxes or baskets that the weight is scattered, so that one carrier does not have a heavy burden, while another goes almost free of a load. Line the boxes or baskets with white wrapping paper.

If such things as baked beans and potato salad are included in the menu they are carried in dainty paper boxes or wooden dishes lined with waxed paper. Small bean pots are very convenient for carrying all kinds of things.

In the packing of the boxes and the baskets, careful preservation of the food must be the most important consideration; the different edibles being securely wrapped in waxed paper.

Small bottles of pickles, packages of salted nuts, boxes of home made candies and well made lemonade are all delicacies that will be appreciated.

The thermos bottle does away with any possible difficulty in procuring good drinking water, and paraffin drinking cups may be used instead of glasses. If one is not supplied with thermos bottles, coffee and milk may be poured into preserve jars with screw covers.

minutes or so before it will be needed, and it will probably be of a consistency to spread well.

Peanut butter sandwiches are good and some people think they are improved by the addition of Roquefort cheese and French dressing to which has been added two drops of onion juice.

Cottage cheese may be varied with chopped nut meats, olives, dates and raisins. Cream cheese is excellent with chopped fruits and tart jams or jellies, with or without chopped nuts. It may be combined with chopped tomatoes, olives or red peppers. One cupful of dry, grated cheese beaten into six tablespoonfuls of chili sauce and spread between slices of white bread is a very good sandwich combination.

An appetizing mixture is made by mixing one-half pint of cream cheese, seasoned to taste with salt, pepper and paprika and mixed with ten chopped olives, a tiny chopped onion, a chopped sour pickle, a chopped sweet green pepper, and a little mayonnaise or boiled dressing. This is delicious spread between crackers. Minced meats reduced to a thick paste by adding butter and olive oil make a very appetizing relish. Sardines or any fish chopped and seasoned with a good sauce are appetizing.

The filling for deviled eggs should be prepared in advance, and by the way, eggs served in this fashion make a tasty relish for picnics, and are

Concerning "Moving" and the Reconstruction of the Complexion

$13.00

IT was on a day in June, dear ladies, a day flooded with warm sunshine, filled with the perfume of roses, and fanned by a gentle breeze, that I called upon my old friend and found her in the throes of moving her household goods to another abode. After a warm, but somewhat distracted greeting, we came to rest in the dismantled drawing-room and fell to the discussion of matters nearest to her mind.

"I have lost any ambition I ever entertained to be considered one of those capable people who do this sort of thing without fuss," she sighed with a wave of her hand, which included the semi-packed condition of things. "If this ever should happen again—which please the fates it will not—I would rather a hundred times have it said, 'What did you do in the Great Moving?' and have no answer but a blush to the finger of scorn turned on me, than be the worn-out wreck that I am at this moment. And the fact that there has been so much to do is entirely my own fault! Three perfectly beautiful invitations have had to be refused within the past two days because I simply must look over and repack this collection of antiquities which I have myself acquired in the past five years."

It seemed advisable for me to relax into a position in which I might listen restfully to this plaintive tale.

"I have grown to hate these odious things," she continued, vehemently. "Every time I see something I really want and could make excellent use of, I remember some similar article I bought one day when I did not need it and which my conscience tells me I should make use of before I replace it. So I either wear the old-fashioned thing and look like last year's almanac, or flaunt the new one with my conscience pricking me painfully."

She became almost tragic, despite my sympathetic smile.

"If you buy what you do not want when you do not want it, you cannot have what you do want when you do want it! And that I have learned to my sorrow."

I felt that some consolation should be offered, but looking out over a sea of ribbons, laces, flowers and queerly-shaped garments, I could only suggest an auction sale where they tell me you may dispose of anything from the family cat to the Pierce Arrow. The suggestion met with colder scorn than I thought it merited.

"It's hereditary," declared my harassed friend, "the collection mania, I mean; I am sure it is a family trait. You remember Aunt Isabel? When her boxes were opened after her death, how many pairs of gloves do you think we found? Gloves, my dear, that had never even been tried on! Over one hundred pair; the silk ones faded and the kid ones hardened with age. I suppose she could not resist gloves, she had such beautiful hands; even when she was an old lady they were white and un wrinkled."

Hoping to divert her mind from her worries and lead the conversation into less troubled channels, I begged to be told if she had ever discovered Aunt Isabel's secret for keeping her hands so beautiful.

"I remember a bottle of olive oil which stood among her lotions and was used faithfully," she replied, "and after any dusty usage she added a little borax to the oil and massaged with it carefully. Afterwards they were rinsed in warm, never hot water, to which a few drops of tincture of benzoin had been added and then carefully dried on a soft towel."

"This interests me strangely," I confessed, "Tell me some more."

"I can do better than that," she replied, getting up and going to the drawer of an old cabinet. "Only today in going over these letters, I found in Aunt Isabel's own writing some instructions for the care of the hands and arms. Let me read it to you: 'To begin the skin treatment—scrub the hands and arms with a flesh brush using pure soap and if possible, rain water. Oatmeal or almond meal may be thrown into the water to soften it and help cleanse and soften the cuticle. This scrubbing cleanses the pores, gets out the dirt and dead skin, and makes the skin brilliant, fresh and transparent. It leaves a redness at first, because the blood has been brought to the surface by such vigorous treatment, but this redness is allayed by gentle massage, with a good skin food. This may be prepared by procuring equal parts of white wax, spermaceti, and powdered camphor, with sufficient olive oil mixed with it during the melting process to make a good emollient. Olive oil alone is excellent for filling out thin places in the hands, wrists or arms and oatmeal helps to whiten when rubbed on after the bath, allowed to remain a few minutes and then brushed away.'"

"Olive oil was evidently cheaper in Aunt Isabel's day than at present, judging by her casual mention of its frequent use," I remarked somewhat ruefully, "but expensive or not, I mean to see what may be done by following her directions. After all, this general sorting of things does bring to light some treasures, doesn't it?"

"Perhaps you are right," was the reply, "This advice is going to be valuable to me, at any rate, when I once more settle down to a quiet existence and put my mind to making my hands presentable once more."

CORRESPONDENCE.

DOLLY J.—It is kind of you to wish me a happy holiday and here's hoping we both enjoy the type of one you specify, for all out-doors, whether motoring, boating or camping, seems very alluring now that the real summer weather has arrived. If camping is your fancy, it would be wise to give a little special care to that departing glory of yours, while on your holiday. The remedy concerning which I have written you, while a troublesome one to use, has given satisfactory results in many cases.

CARRIE G.—Indeed it would be just no trouble at all if I could suggest a remedy for the worry you describe, but I very much fear that this is not a case where my advice would help. Such a condition must be the result of a physical weakness which could only be located by a doctor. When you have found the cause and remedied it, remember that the skin around the eyes is very easily stretched and should be delicately treated when massaging the face. Also, should you then desire, I would be glad to send you the name of a cream which would doubtless be beneficial.

THROUGH-THE-LOOKING-GLASS COUPON

Should a reader desire to avail herself of any advice which might be given through this department, her inquiry, written on one side of the paper, should be accompanied by this coupon. In the case of desiring a private answer, a stamped and addressed envelope should be enclosed.

When the Wanderlust Tugs at Our Shoestrings

$25.00

THIS season the air with us in fall bears the great breeding of the nomads. All they fill the shops, the stations, the boats, the streets. You can tell them by their attire, and you spot them by their aggressive earnestness to be up and doing every minute of the time. They must do Toronto to-day, London to-morrow, Rome and Paris as quickly as possible. Their bags are earmarked with hotel labels and shipping tags. Their bulging purses contain yards of tickets, many-colored checks, small mirrors, powder puffs, and an extra tooth-brush in case of accident. We know we can pick out the matter-of-fact, confident American by the pose and certainty of movement born of much travelling; we are equally sure that we can locate the English-woman with her stout shoes, her tweed skirt, and her general adaptation to the needs of the moment. The foreigners are marked men and women for their speech bewrayeth them, making them the legitimate prey of those vampires who extract their living from the pockets of the unwary globe-trotter.

Now that the war is over and people are free once more to roam the world at large there is a general desire on the part of those who have the means to cope with advanced prices, to fare forth to the uttermost parts of the earth. Those whose peregrinations were confined largely to their own country are now at liberty once more to indulge their restlessness and go in search of pastures new. The ocean liners are crowded with those who are going over to view disinterestedly the scenes of carnage, or those who are on a sadder mission and whose saddened eyes will look for one small spot in that area of devastation where rests a beloved husband, son, or brother.

There is something of the gypsy in each one of us. Perhaps we inherit from pioneer forebears the spirit that at times bids us draw close to Nature—to cast aside the trammels of conventionality and decorum to revel in the freedom of the great out-of-doors. The innocuous picnic in the family Tin-Lizzie is an embodiment of this spirit in its simplest form and many consider themselves completely given over to Bohemianism when they motor to the outskirts of the city and beside some perfectly sober and eminently safe river, draw forth a prodigious hamper lined methodically with a full equipment of table necessities and a well-packed luncheon carefully prepared by a very orthodox cook.

BUT, oh, my friends, you who have actually roughed it in Canadian or foreign wilds—you know the spurious from the real. The dilettante picnic by motor is as a walk along Broadway when compared with an outing in the northern woods when one is miles from civilization and one's next meal is more or less a matter of speculation and good luck. My heart goes back in fond reminiscence to a time when my husband and I with two congenial friends paddled our way through unknown lakes and for weeks at a time threaded unfamiliar water-ways or camped beside some wondrous lake in the shade and scent of hemlock and pine. Who could ever forget those exquisite mornings—the fresh crispness of the early day with opalescent mists stealing over the lake, a slow-flying heron blending with the softness of water and sky; the faint calling of the loon as it dived for its breakfast or the garrulous chatter of squirrels in the branches over our head? Who could ever forget the flavor of bacon and coffee prepared over a sweet-scented fire or the delicate brown pancakes tossed nonchalantly in the pan by one's experienced husband? And the long days of paddling, sweeping with measured stroke over the green waters, breathing in the fresh sweetness of cool winds or watching the sunlight chase past one's bow like strings of flashing gems! What can equal in importance the choosing of a spot where one can pitch one's tent for a night or more? What discovery can equal in thrills the finding of a clear spot of grass among the dense forest growth or the sense of satisfaction in seeing one's tent snugly pitched, one's evening fire ablaze and the prospect of a night of dreamless sleep on fragrant hemlock branches?

AND in speaking of this out-door life I wonder if any woman ever came closer to Nature than our own Indian poet and writer—Pauline Johnson. In reading over her poems they seem to breathe of rustling trees, of the cadence of waterfall or the lapping of waves along Erie's strand. Her paddle did, indeed, sing a song to ears attuned most exquisitely to every sound of the world about her. She was one with the spirit of freedom that laughed in the spray that dashed over the bow of her canoe as she shot a dangerous rapid—one with the sunlight that danced on the waters of the picturesque Grand beside which she was born, or that flashed upon northern lakes seldom traversed by man or woman. She loved to sleep beneath the starlit skies, lulled to rest by the cry of the whip-poor-will or the murmuring of a nearby waterfall. Close she was then to that Great Spirit which her Indian fathers worshipped as the Manitou—the same beneficent God to whom one is so wondrously close when living in the heart of His silent forests. As Pauline Johnson so beautifully expressed it in her poem, "The Camper,"

"Of man no need has he, of God no prayer,
He and his Deity are brothers there."

Brothers! That is it! And who does not feel saner, cleaner, closer to all that is sweet and pure and good when no roof shuts out the arching sky and where the stars seem to twinkle from that far-off country where the King himself resides! God may be omnipresent, but somehow I like to think of Him as I did when a child—a great Loving Heart hidden behind the blue of His own bright sky, but looking down with infinite compassion upon His children whose eyes need search no farther than the wonders of those same glowing skies for an evidence of His power and greatness—and love. And those of us who had the rare privilege of knowing intimately our Indian poet, can understand so well the feeling that made her wish to sleep in that quiet grave on the Pacific coast—a spot kissed by the sea-winds, cleansed by the freshness of water and sky, close to all that for the Indian chief's daughter had made life really worth while.

AND I can understand the presence among us at this season of the year of so many who are apparently strangers in a strange land. They are possessed by the wanderlust. The gypsy strain is coming out and they must go—anywhere so long as they are not stationary. Inherent traits may not drive them to the depths of the forest or any other solitude, but their own roof-tree for the moment has failed to keep them and though in time they will be glad to return to that haven of comfort, they must, for the present, move on as if driven from place to place by some spectral cop who will not let them linger. They are vagabonds on the face of the earth.

Many of them will of course not fare farther than to some comfortable hotel where they do not have to think out the meals for the day, where domestic troubles are for the time being dead or at least pleasantly somnolent. And hotel life can be very interesting at times. One meets so many types interesting or otherwise. There is the gossip who soon finds her little sphere where she is a

A Story of August Travels

The Land of P'raps

By BETH SADLEIR

A HIGH, crystal wall barred the way at the beginning of the August road. Diddy Happen and Dedder Naherrin heard voices singing, and saw a rope ladder being lowered from the top of the wall. Strange little figures appeared on the top of the wall, some of whom looked after the ladder, while others called down to the travellers:

"Come up! Come up!"

They were all letter-men. Each one who held the ladder was a H-E-L-P, while those who called were the C-o-m-e-s.

Diddy climbed the ladder first, and then old Dedder Naherrin came up to the top of the wall, too. Both of them had forgotten the little If, who was in a great way at being left behind.

The Helps were drawing

ed the August days, they saw that the farther they journeyed there were more fields of stubble. The grain that still stood hung ripe-brown, heavy heads, and every day was filled with glorious summer sunshine. The travellers saw many harvesters. There were the birds, noisy and happy, and once Diddy caught a glimpse of a little chipmunk, his pouched cheeks stuffed with wheat-grains.

There were men, too, but they were too busy to stop work and talk.

The winding roadway led them to the strangest house which they had seen upon their journeyings.

It stood in a clear field by the roadside, a broad path leading up to its wide-open doorway. The walls and the doors were built of sheaves of wheat, of oats, the rope-ladder up very slowly, when the If gave one despairing leap into the air, turned head-downwards, and caught the lowest rung of the ladder by his curly, crooked tail. He was soon at the top of the wall, too, but immediately fell off on the other side, having been frightened by an odd creature who scampered toward him at a great rate.

The If was not hurt a bit, and Dedder Naherrin laughed as he said:

"That chap who scared the If is a H-u-r-r-y, and we had better get down from here, for I am sure something is going to happen."

Diddy and Dedder jumped from the wall, and found, not the hard roadway they had expected, but a broad pathway with a soft, yielding surface.

"Why, the August road is gravelled with grains of wheat!" exclaimed Diddy.

"Of course," said Dedder Naherrin, who had not known one thing about it before that very minute. "August is the harvest month, and its path of days winds through fields of grain."

Diddy could see the grain fields himself. The little If, who had disappeared amongst the waving wheat, now, popped into sight again, and raced madly toward Diddy. A tall, thin figure was running stiffly and awkwardly after the If, but it halted when Diddy pointed his finger at it.

"It can't hurt you," said Diddy to the trembling little If. "It's only a scarecrow whose name is P-r-e-t-e-n-d."

The scarecrow walked slowly backward to its place out in the wheat field, while the travellers walked onward.

As they passed the small white stone by the wayside that mark-

As Diddy and Dedder Naherrin entered, they found themselves in the midst of a crowd of letter-men, who greeted them warmly. As their song had told, they were the harvesters, and Diddy could recognize the Mow, the Reap, the Bind, the Thresh, and many others.

The floor was of plaited straw, as were the walls, and there were windows open to the summer breeze. There were seats of bags of grain, and baskets of summer fruit were all around for everyone to help himself.

There was more singing, and there were games in which the letter-men got so mixed up that Diddy could hardly tell one from the other. The fun was at its height when there came a change. Without a moment's warning, the home of the Harvesters disappeared, the happy letter-men were gone.

Diddy and Dedder Naherrin could see the August road in front of them.

Equal in appearance to the best English Club Bag

THE NAUGAHYDE BAG is different from any other travelling bag on the market—and it is these differences in material and construction that make it so desirable.

IT IS ALL IN ONE PIECE

IT IS ABSOLUTELY WATERPROOF

THE NAUGAHYDE BAG is made of a new composition material, based on Rubber, which is vulcanized into one solid, seamless piece by a new and patented process. Even the heavy protecting parts on the corners are fused right into the bag.

No stitching or riveting is required. The bag is all strength—and absolutely waterproof. Not a drop of water will leak through, even if the bag be left in the rain all day.

THE NAUGAHYDE BAG has the appearance of the best quality of leather bag—has the soft, pliable top—is lined with heavy brown twill—and equals in appearance the best English Club Bag.

The cost, of course, is much less.

Made in 16 in., 18 in. and 20 in. sizes for Men.

Made in 14 in., 16 in. and 18 in. sizes for Women.

Flax Magicians in Canada

By VICTORIA HAYWARD

This interesting article, for which illustrations are found on opposite page was written by one who is familiar with the scenes of the industry here described. Flax workers are from overseas and are keeping alive in this Dominion an industry which belongs to the race.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EDITH S. WATSON

THE kingdom of fine linen spans the globe. Like our own British Empire, the sun never sets on it. And everywhere this kingdom of fine linen is a kingdom of womanhood. As in the earliest times the bride of the Pharaohs had her linen-chest, so, the Canadian housewife of this twentieth century anchors the issue of her social success to fine nappery. No phrase in the language enkindles the imagination like "Purple and fine linen."

In view of all this, the flax-grower, breaker, washer, spinner, and weaver is transformed from artizan to creative magician, whose wand is a shuttle.

But the historic and even the art side are not all.

Linen, thing of exquisite beauty thing of intrinsic value, is hand work—and the gift of women to women. For flax-workers the world over, through all ages, have been and are women. The very life of flax depends on us. We hold it in our hands. In a double sense, we have the power to make or break it. As woman's love and appreciation is an inheritance, so the ability to be a flax-worker, a flax-craftsman is an inheritance.

A full thousand years, perhaps more, of experience in flax-growing stands behind the Russian women-flax-growers of British Columbia. And when circumstance brought them to Canada, twenty years ago, it brought along with them, as a free gift to our civilization, their wonderful flax-knowledge gleaned in the fields of old Russia—the largest flax-growing country in the world.

In a way this remnant of women holding the torch of flax alight in the West, may be regarded as saviors of the linen industry. For flax-growing in Russia seems on a fair way to extinction. If so, these peasant artizans may be pawns, moved purposely by the Master Player from the Steppes to the Canadian West that linen may not perish and that our Canada shall have a new industry put into her hand—a deathless industry, since as long as women inherit the earth we shall call for fine linen.

Flax is a drama in many acts. It is not a thing, from either the aesthetic or the material angle, which springs up over night. It is a long trail, and a fine one. It is a trail that blends well with Canada.

PAULA, gleaming Millet-like in the flax fields of her "village" ranch, has a crop to show, with fibre nearly three feet long, or as long as the best. She may be regarded as the star in the first act. She prepared the soil, with assistance of course, planted the seed, tended it, and now pulls the mature plant at the right moment of its yellowing. Paula is no novice. Every line of her bending figure expresses deep and intimate knowledge, infinite patience—consummate power. She and her sisters convert the landscape about them into a beau ideal Canadian Barbizon.

Nysta is the star of Act II. The "soul of the Ages" lies hid in this old wooden knife—flax-knife with one end hinged so that the wooden blade falls between the two horizontal boards of the stand. This knife, tradition says, was an invention of the ancient Egyptians. And, primitive as it is, we've never been able to improve on it, for its particular work of breaking the flax, and de-seeding it.

If this is so it does embody "the soul of the ages," and how significant is its presence here in Western Canada. I'm sure that we never even supposed any of our industries were in the debt of Egypt, and yet here in this one picture we happen upon both Russia and Egypt combining to serve us of the West. Flax is very democratic; perhaps the more so because of its assured position. Not only is it democratic, but it is cosmopolitan—and sweetly feminine. Nysta and her Egyptian knife are indeed a revelation, a hitherto unknown facet of damask.

Now so far, this tale of flax has been of the earth, earthy. Act. III is as it should be—a rouser. Here the scene changes entirely. We are taken away from the fields to the river. And who, I ask, would take this third picture, of Marcia washing flax in the swift current, for a Canadian scene? When we first glimpsed it from the steep bank above, the shades of evening were beginning to creep over the peaks of the Rockies and down the river, giving to Marcia's figure a sort of setting of unreality.

Nothing going before had prepared us for this third act; and the curtain was raised on it so suddenly that for the moment it was like waking out of a dream and finding ourselves beside the river Lys in Belgium, where they ret flax, weighting it down with stones, in this way—the flax that is used to make the famous linen of Courtrai. Retting calls for fine judgment. If the stalks are not submerged long enough, the woody part is not removed, if too long the fibre is injured. Marcia says a week to ten days in the Columbia usually does the trick, aided by a good rubbing from her own skilful hands at the end of that time. She goes down every day at the end of a week to ascertain the condition of it.

OUT of Marcia's hand, the clean fibre, snarly as it is, is hung on a clothes line, that the four winds of heaven may dry it. Then it is heckled, or cleared, on the upright teeth of the hand-made heckling board and given into the hand of Feodora to spin on her flax-wheel;—the Russian flax-wheel brought from the old country, or made here by Feodora's husband on old-country models. Feodora has the making of linen-thread at her finger tips and the gentle whiz of her wheel is one of the sounds of her village. She has to keep busy to supply Hannah at the loom with the warp and woof which the big hand-made loom eats up even faster than she can spin.

The loom is part of the furniture here, as it is in the habitation homes of Old Quebec. Hannah is a master hand at weaving linen. Her sisters in Old Quebec are wool operators, but she is a flax artist. She weaves long strips of linen to lay away in the linen chest. She it is who centralizes the work of "the gleaner," "the breaker," "the washer," and "the spinner." Hers is "the fifth" and last "Act," and is so big that it fills all "the stage" and sends us away—thinking! Thinking on the tale of art, that linen-making in Canada unfolds

Canadian Women Favor Musical Progress

Declaration of Policy by Congress of the National Council of Women

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

AT the recent Congress of the National Council of Women of Canada, which took place two or three months ago, there was some very fruitful discussion of music, and resolutions were passed demanding a wider diffusion of musical education. It was an appropriate subject for such an organization to take up, for the home and its betterment must continue to be the first consideration with the women of this country; and in these pages the present writer has on many occasions emphasized the importance of music as a factor in home-making.

The Council did not base their resolutions on "fourteen points," but contented themselves with eight. These eight points, however, are so interesting as to be worthy of detailed discussion.

Point One is so sweeping that a few years ago it would have been viewed with skepticism; "Music is a necessity, not a luxury." This is a modern conclusion based on careful investigation of the relation of music to social conditions which has been in progress for about ten years. It is a psychological fact that a vast majority of the human race naturally and, even unconsciously, turn to music as a means of expression; in other words are possessed of musical instincts, which have only to be developed to be a source of deep natural pleasure. It is a tendency that has been discernible in mankind from the earliest times, and the advance of civilization might almost be marked by the advance in the quality of music, and in popular appreciation of it. It is a fact that wherever you find a singing people you will also find a cheery, industrious and for the most part, contented people. These facts indicate that music meets a deeply-rooted human need, and take it altogether out of the category of luxury.

This being admitted, the Second Point adopted by the Council is its logical corollary: "Every child has an inherent right to a musical education." If there is an inherent taste for anything, and that taste is not merely harmless but distinctly beneficial in a spiritual sense, then there arises an inherent right based on it, as defined in the above axiom. The point involves the whole issue of musical progress. The efforts of educationists and the influence of women must be directed more effectively than they have been in the past, toward making music just as much a part of a child's experience and instruction, as arithmetic.

THE utilitarian side of the musical movement is emphasized in Point Three, which affirms: "Unity through music is a means of civic improvement." I must admit that this statement is rather general but it has a bearing on what has been said on the effect of music on the morals and manners of communities. When you have a musical community you usually have a united community, and only a united community can really accomplish very much for itself, or for civilization in the abstract. I know that German illustrations are unpopular, but when we look back to the events of 1914, the amazing solidarity of the German people in support of a bad cause becomes apparent.

Point Four brackets itself naturally with the preceding one. It reads: "Patriotism is developed by music." This is a truth that has been recognized for centuries and does not possess the elements of novelty characteristic of some of the others promulgated. We need only look to Canada itself. Not merely in the matter of recruiting during the late war, but in the maintenance of morale, whether in the army or on the "home front," music proved an indispensable aid. Without it, it is admitted, Canada's effort based as it was on aspiration and sentiment, two elements directly stimulated in most persons by music, could not have been what it was. And what is true of this country is true of nearly every other country which participated in the war. Every successful general, every statesman charged with responsibility, early recognized the truth of Point Four.

THE considerations involved in Point Five are of the most profound importance in a nation built up under the peculiar conditions which have prevailed in Canada. It reads: "The spirit of comradeship, regardless of race or creed, is induced by music." Getting down to practical

A FORMER PRESIDENT

Mrs. F. H. Torrington, of Toronto, a past president of the National Council, has done much to encourage the study of music, and has always been interested in the work of Canadian musicians.

examples we find that this statement has been proven at every turn in the history of Canada. In Toronto choral music has for more than half a century been a force that has promoted comradeship between people of different denominations. In the palmy days of the late Dr. Torrington, when the Philharmonic Society was building up a public interest in good music of inestimable value, the leading figures in his organization, and the soloists, when chosen from local forces, represented every leading Christian denomination. The same is true of the Mendelssohn Choir which has carried on the work begun by the Philharmonic Society to a point of excellence which has given it international abolished, there must be established in their stead places of clean amusement." The ideas involved in this statement bear a close relationship to what has been said in commenting on the First Point with regard to the response, that music awakens in the breast of everyone. Though it is sometimes assailed, it is, of all the arts, the least susceptible of degradation. Whenever you find music associated with anything debasing, it is always in connection with some other craft, that of the ribald verse-writer or the obscene dancer, for example. Of itself, it is clean, as John Wesley proved when he declared that the devil should not have all the best tunes and proceeded to appropriate fame. With the multiplication of choral organizations some have naturally arisen which possess a denominational significance but the leading choral organizations in all Canadian cities undoubtedly bring into closer social relations persons of diverse beliefs and nationality. In scanning the accounts of the great provincial musical festivals held in the Western provinces this spring, this condition was apparent. Of the ability of music to break down the barriers of race and creed, I can cite no more interesting instance than the history of the now universally familiar air, "O Canada." This melody was composed over thirty years ago in connection with a movement to promote French-Canadian solidarity through artistic channels. After the tune had been accepted as appropriate for patriotic expression, Judge Routhier of Quebec, wrote words supposed to be peculiarly local in racial and religious feeling. Yet the melody was so fine that it burst its bounds, and with English words is now sung throughout Canada; so that in every public assemblage from ocean to ocean "O Canada" is now heard as a ceremonial melody and constitutes a genuine link between adverse sections of the Canadian people.

The National Council also discerned a possible relation between music and social service as indicated in the Sixth and lengthiest of its Points: "Music is the most useful medium in constructive work in a community. With the saloon and dance hall these tunes for the Methodist hymnology.

Point Seven which reads: "Music tends to encourage a higher form of citizenship," is a logical complement of what has gone before. If music accomplishes all that has been claimed for it in connection with the preceding six points, then it is obvious that it assists in the formation of a higher citizenship. It may be prejudice on the part of one who has all his life associated with musical people, but I think there may be discerned among them a saner and more generous attitude toward mankind and the universe than among those who "have no music in the their souls."

Point Eight is more sweeping and less susceptible of proof than any of the foregoing. It reads: "Music is a powerful curative for mental, moral and physical ailments." I would modify that by saying that in certain cases it is a powerful auxiliary. In the case of physical ailments, those of us who love music can say that it is sometimes a sedative as good as a harmless narcotic for relieving a bed of pain; and as such, it no doubt helps nature to exercise her curative influence. Mental disorders, I am afraid, lie too deep to be touched by music, and sometimes destroy native love for music in a victim. I do not know exactly what is meant by moral disorders, but since music is invariably a useful handmaid of religion, perhaps this particular section of the claim may be regarded as obvious also.

Write down figures from one to eight, one beneath the other. Words Nos. 1 and 6 (illustrated) may be found on the little girl's face. Words 3 and 5 are closely connected with word 2. Word 7 is part of word 4. Word 8 alone remains.

No. 2. Within the circle are five little pictures. The initials of these, if named correctly, give the name of the flower for August.

Directions for Washing Georgette, Crepe or Silk Blouses.

Whisk a tablespoon of Lux into a thick lather in half a basinful of boiling or very hot water. Add cold water till lukewarm. Dip your blouse through the foamy lather several times. Squeeze the suds through it—do not rub. Rinse in three waters at the same temperature as the water in which you washed it. Squeeze the water out—do not wring. When damp, fold the blouse in a towel, leave for a few minutes, then press with a warm iron—never a hot one.

Georgette Crepe blouses should be gently pulled into shape while ironing.

FOR washing dainty and delicate blouses of Georgette, Crepe or Silk, use Lux. It will clean them beautifully, and after washing and ironing, they will look even better than when new.

Lux will not harm any garment, however delicate or dainty, that pure water itself will not hurt.

Lux is a concentrated form of pure soap essence.

Lux is manufactured in a very special manner, and is absolutely pure; in fact, no form of soap essence can be made in a purer form.

There is no substitute for Lux. There is nothing like Lux. Lux is in a class by itself.

You can wash any garment with Lux without fear of having it spoiled. The whole secret lies in the matchless purity of the little satiny Lux flakes. Delicate silks, lingerie—underwear—stockings—anything dainty that one wears or keeps about the house, can be washed beautifully with Lux.

LUX is on sale at all Grocers, Departmental Stores, &c.

A handy little recipe booklet entitled, "The Care of Dainty Clothes" will be gladly sent free on request.

Time and Money

We want and we will liberally pay one energetic lady in each community to represent the "Canadian Home Journal."

We already have scores of local representatives in our big Home Journal Club, and some are making as high as $100.00 per month.

There are still many towns and villages in Canada in which we have not a representative and if you have any spare time that you desire to turn into money, write us to-day.

The remuneration of a "Canadian Home Journal" representative is according to the time and activity devoted to the work.

If you have plenty of time and energy there is practically no limit to your income or territory, for we make special provision for the live ones.

The women of Canada require more money to-day than at any time in the history of the nation. The "Home Journal" will supply that money in exchange for your time.

Write us to-day.

Among the "wild ducks," no duck is so dear to the heart of the sportsman as the "Mallard." This species is one of the handsomest and most valuable of ducks, and is largely used as a table bird. The head is green and purplish blue, bill olive green, and eyes of brown. Their notes are a nasal quack, often rapidly repeated when feeding.

The "canvas back" is an excellent swimmer and diver, and is one of the most persistently hunted birds, for its flesh is much esteemed and has a high market value.

PRIZE STORY.

"The Squirrel," by Mary E. Jackson, age 11 years, R.R. No. 1, Malton, Ontario.

IN Canada we have these squirrels—grey, black, red, flying, and ground. Surely there is no one who would not rather make pets of squirrels than see them killed for their tails.

Grey squirrels can be easily encouraged to make their homes in our parks, where their tricks entertain many people. A few nuts or a piece of cake will quickly win their confidence. They have no fear of anyone watching them openly, but will continue their work quietly.

Except in color, the black squirrels resemble the grey. They delight in the new-fallen snow, which sends a thrill of joy through their active bodies. Then the stillness of the winter air is broken by the sounds of hurrying squirrels as they measure off the snow in twin footprints. Its whiteness is a very striking background for their black fur.

Their cousin, the red squirrel, looks out of his lofty opening in the hollow tree very discontentedly at the white world. He does not like the snow, and longs for warm, bright, summer days. In this season he is very mischievous, robbing birds' nests, and even stealing food from his relations when he has no need of it.

Flying squirrels have no wings, but folds of skin extending sideways as they stretch their legs and leap from branch or tree-top. They are easily tamed, and make loving playmates.

Chipmunks, gophers of the Prairie Provinces, and their dark-colored cousins of British Columbia are species of ground squirrels.

The chipmunks are daintily striped. Their burrows are wonderful structures of animal intelligence.

Gophers, in their open burrows, destroy the planted grain or cut the stalks. Farmers go to great expense to check their raids. They find it well to protect the rough-legged hawk, which is the gophers' enemy.

THE WANDERING ZINGARI.

By BERTHA E. GREEN.

A STRANGE race are the Gypsies, which is not to be wondered at, for they have changed their manners and wandering habits but little in all of four hundred years.

We hear of them first in Europe as wandering in large bands throughout Germany, early in the fifteenth century. Their dark complexion, and the strange language which they spoke, marked them as a peculiar people. They claimed to have come from Lower Egypt on a seven years' wandering pilgrimage. There was a well-told story, a good excuse for their wandering so far from home—a good story, but not a true one.

The name by which they called themselves, Zingary or Zingari, comes from a language which belongs, not to Egypt, but to India or Hindostan.

Thus Does the Mode Adapt Itself to Individual Needs

8887—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Size 36 requires 2½ yards 40-inch Georgette crêpe. This is to be a suit season and all the devotees of suits know the value of a Georgette blouse. This model is especially designed for the stout woman and beading in design 12512 lifts it above the commonplace.

8857—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 3½ yards 54-inch serge—¼ yard 40-inch white organdy for collar. Straight tailored lines are always a boon to the woman who would look more slender and this model of blue serge boasts just such lines. It closes on the left shoulder and under the left arm, and to relieve the severity it is attractively braided in design 12376.

8268—Ladies' Tunic Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 8835—Ladies' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 3¾ yards 54-inch white tricotine. Braiding is applied with a lavish hand on this attractive frock of white tricotine, using design 11664 to outline the collar and the U-shaped neck, while 12319 forms a very deep border on the tunic. The long lines of this tunic blouse are splendid for the woman of full figure and a narrow girdle of self-material holds in the waist-line fulness loosely.

8888—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 5½ yards 36-inch black satin—¾ yard 40-inch white Georgette crêpe for vest—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. This smart afternoon gown of black satin has narrow panels at the side-front which are caught under at the lower edge of the blouse and stitched to form pockets at the top. These panels as well as the sleeves are braided in design 11514. There is a vestee of white Georgette crêpe and one of the new studded leather belts encircles the waist-line. The entire costume follows the lines of the coat-frock—a type of garment dear to the heart of Paris, and a perfect joy to the woman who aims for slenderness. It has the double advantage of superlative smartness and unfailing utility upon all occasions.

8881—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 3876—Ladies' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 24 to 38 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 4½ yards 30-inch foulard—¾ yard 40-inch organdy for collar and cuffs—2½ yards 36-inch lining for underbody and top of skirt. Foulard, elbow sleeves, and a touch of organdy is an unfailing recipe for Summer comfort, and never were the three combined more effectively than in this charming model. The wide surplice collar and turn-back cuffs are of crisp white organdy daintily embroidered in design 11339. A ribbon sash ties with long ends at the side-front. The shoes worn with this costume betray their French accent by their shortened vamps and ankle-straps.

Youth Adopts Enthusiastically the Short Sleeve Decried by Paris

8722—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 16 requires  $3\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch figured voile— $2\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch lining for underbody and foundation skirt—1 yard satin ribbon for sash. Over a foundation that may be of net, China silk, or silk mull, is dropped the skirt of this charming frock gathered in at the bottom harem-wise. The closing is at the back. The blouse is cut down in deep U-shaping and is arranged over a dart-fitted underbody.

8617—Misses' Dress. Designed for 16 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  yard. Size 16 requires 3 yards 36-inch crêpe mêtêre— $1\frac{1}{4}$  yard fillet banding— $2\frac{1}{8}$  yards  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inch fillet lace— $1\frac{1}{8}$  yard  $\frac{1}{2}$ -inch lace—2 yards grosgrain ribbon— $2\frac{5}{8}$  yards 36-inch lining. Floating gaily above a harem skirt of crêpe mêtêre are two flounces of fillet lace topped by a cambré-like bodice held in position by two loops of ribbon over the shoulders.

8692—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 16 requires  $3\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch linen. Straight-line frocks are designed this Summer in white and pastel tones for the young girl who prefers a tailored type of frock for morning and informal wear. To relieve the plainness of these frocks, however, embroidery is lavishly used sometimes in mercerized cotton, occasionally in wool. A most attractive design is illustrated on this frock, 12547, forming a double border effect. Something to intrigue the feminine imagination are the new shoes, so chic and alluring that they really tempt to extravagance. But when one realizes that the whole effect of the smartest costume may be ruined by inappropriate or ill-fitting shoes, it does not seem really extravagant to buy the best one can afford.

8814—Misses' Slip-on Blouse. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Size 16 requires  $2\frac{3}{4}$  yards 32-inch pongee. In the favored fabrics this Summer pongee has not been forgotten and it fashions many of the most charming overblouses, particularly the type that is used for sports wear. For trimming on this model there is quaint embroidery in design 12508 applied to the pockets.

8819—Misses' Slip-on Blouse. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Size 16 requires  $3\frac{3}{8}$  yards 36-inch linen. Flowing sleeves in three-quarter length afford a slight relief from the ubiquitous short sleeve and for decoration there is a deep band at the bottom extending up at the sides into button-trimmed tabs.

8946—Ladies' Slip-on Overblouse. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. No. 8971—Ladies' Bodice Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires  $4\frac{1}{4}$  yards 40-inch Georgette crêpe— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch net or silk for bodice. Many of the Summer frocks are characterized by slim, simple lines even when fashioned of such sheer fabrics as Georgette crêpe and voile. The combination of this gathered kimono slip-on blouse and skirt with bodice top offers two of the newest style features. The skirt is designed to be worn especially with the modish overblouses and tie-back blouses and hangs from the shoulders. The only note of trimming on the costume is the embroidery applied in motifs on the skirt and blouse in design 11636. Embroidery appears on everything this season and is worked out in silk, wool, chenille, raffia—even leather in narrow strips is used.

8926—Ladies' Bodice. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8962—Ladies' Tier Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires  $6\frac{1}{4}$  yards 36-inch foulard— $1\frac{1}{4}$  yard embroidered organdy banding for trimming—2 yards 36-inch lining for underbody and top of skirt. The modish tie-back bodice and tier skirt are combined in this charming frock, essentially feminine in style and yet simple and easy to make. The front panel of the bodice extends around in girdle effect and is attached to sash ends, and the sleeves whether long or short are equally charming. On the two-piece gathered foundation there are two flounces.

8968—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $5\frac{1}{4}$  yards 32-inch check gingham— $\frac{1}{2}$  yard 32-inch plain gingham for pipings— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. It is a matter for congratulation that many of the Summer frocks are so simple of line that their making comes easily within the scope of the home dressmaker's ability. Here, for example, is a modish frock, charming in effect and very easily made. Over the back-closing blouse is arranged a panel front and back fastening on the left shoulder. The belt sections extend around the waist-line from either side of the front panel finishing in tie ends at the back. Nothing could be smarter to wear with this frock than the new French vamp slippers of white washable kid fastening with a strap over the instep.

8961—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires 5 yards 36-inch dotted swiss— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard plaited organdy for frill— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Dotted swiss works out particularly well in this model, the tucked blouse giving the effect of the fashionable Eton.

8966—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 8951—Ladies' Two-piece Tunic Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires  $7\frac{3}{8}$  yards 36-inch figured voile—1 yard narrow grosgrain ribbon— $\frac{3}{4}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. A most engaging addition to the Summer wardrobe is this frock of printed voile with wool embroidery introduced as trimming. The embroidery is in design 12473 and is applied to the long revers in pyramid-like motifs. Not the least of the style of the frock is due to the draped tunic.

8954—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $4\frac{3}{8}$  yards 36-inch linen— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Despite the allurements of the silhouette that widens at the hips, many smart women prefer the simple straight-line frock like this to be fashioned of linen or the heavier cotton fabrics. Over the shoulders are trimming-bands forming triple loops below the belt and caught under again at the hem. For trimming there are motifs and a border of embroidery worked out in design 12352.

Clothes for the Small Girl

For Mid-summer and School Re-opening

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

WE recall having heard once upon a time, someone, somewhere, say that the real reason why so many mechanical toys were sold, was that the grown-ups who bought them, were so fond of playing with them. The children furnished an excuse for buying them. There may be a similar reason why, all down through the ages, so much time, ingenuity and energy have been expended devising clothes for children, especially little girls. Parents and guardians enjoy seeing them prettily dressed, and how true to type is the small girl, as with sparkling eyes and dancing feet, before the mirror, she beholds the magic of a new frock, a coveted string of beads or a new bow on her hair. Eve bequeathed to her kind an instinctive love of dress which very early begins to assert itself.

And in passing one cannot help remarking upon how much the youth of to-day have to be thankful for inasmuch as they did not happen to be contemporaries of the renowned Baby Stuart or Little Lord Fauntleroy, or even the panteletted little folk of Grandmother's family album. Perhaps we are prejudiced but we really think children, both girls and boys, never were so prettily and sensibly dressed as they are in this day and generation, with all due respect to Mammies and dressmakers of other days and generations.

It has become a habit among fashion writers, in a more or less prosaic and convincing way, to dispose of the matter of children's dresses, coats and millinery, by saying they are miniature replicas of women's clothes. This is partly true as there are certain characteristics to be found in garments of all sizes and for all ages, during every period. But this year the designer has set herself (women usually design little girls' clothes) the delightful task of making clothes as simple as they are beautiful, and as consistent as they are comfortable. Their play clothes, lacking starch and ruffles, are ideal; their party dresses, having ruffles, make them look like fragile flowers. The importance of the juvenile wardrobe has become such that the stores, —all the larger ones at least,—have made separate departments of children's garments where one may find almost everything needed without going out of the department. And this year, when wandering leisurely through these departments, one wonders if Mother Goose has been reincarnated for the purpose of designing children's dresses, for there, adorning play aprons, rompers, creepers, and even small dresses, are the famous cat that ran away with the spoon, little Jack Horner who sat in the corner, Little Miss Muffet who sat on a tuffet, and numberless other celebrities immortalized in Mother Goose rhymes. Animals are especially popular and we are told that the new things for fall will be just as Mother Goosey as ever, having wonderful animal pockets and embroidery.

THE harem hem which has been worn so much by fashionable women this summer, may have suggested the small dress skirt designed for play dresses, which is doubled up under the hem and held in place by tapes or gathered into an elastic. The idea is to conceal the undergarments, no matter how much the small wearer may romp about. Gingham dresses with bloomers to match are sometimes offered in the stores, and are a most practical combination.

The original of this little frock was a tropical print, with green ground, trimmed with tan. One could also imagine it reproduced in brown taffeta.

A very advanced style, shown in New York this spring, was a smock and bloomer suit, the smock being made of black sateen and the bloomers of pink. They are also shown by Canadian stores. The illustration shows the effect. We talk about certain colors belonging to childhood, and others old age. For instance, blue and pink have always been considered suitable for the very young, and mauve for the mature, but this year, we have beautiful mauves, yellows and greens, made up for very small girls. Gingham with green and mauve have been preferred to blues and pinks and for organdie, there are mauves and greens and also crisp yellows, with of course the prescribed blues and pinks once so indispensable. And one might say in passing, that the older ladies, while not exactly adopting pale blues and pinks, have certainly an eye for the gay colors, as evidenced by their hat trimmings. We watched the congregations streaming out of three churches one recent Sunday morning, in New York, and while the young girls and matrons wore mostly trig little unassuming chapeaux, these dear ladies of riper years wore garlands and garlands of bright-colored flowers on their headwear. Please pardon the digression. One's mind will wander on a hot day. We were writing of gingham and organdies, were we not?

The little gingham frock which we have selected for illustration, really got into print because of its green coloring and the ruffles which adorn it. While play clothes are extremely plain, school dresses admit of a little more elaboration, ruffles being the form adopted by many designers, and on organdie and net dresses, it seems as if there cannot be too many ruffles, and as a rule they are edged with lace. The short sleeves in the gingham model and also in the little print one, as well as the short puffs in the net and organdies, will commend themselves to anyone selecting a dress for a small girl this summer. But by the time this issue of the Journal reaches our readers, the summer vacation will be half gone and ere we realize it, schools and colleges will be reopening, and there will be a grand scramble to replenish the school girl's wardrobe, so a word or two about that important item, may not come amiss.

The rules concerning clothes for the college girl, that is the girl who attends a girls' college, are very strict. Each college has its own uniform and a list and description of the clothes the student requires is supplied on request or when arrangements have been made for her enrollment. But one of the essentials in all colleges is a gymnasium suit, though differing somewhat in detail. It consists of middie and bloomers, the latter being cut very full and pleated in at the waist. Serge is the usual material and there are both serge and white cotton middies. The middie suit, especially that with the dark middie, is really a reincarnation of the once so popular sailor suit, plus the bloomers which when made to be worn with a skirt are fitted on the hips. The collar is trimmed with three rows of white or black braid, and to be perfectly correct, the silk tie should be black, as a sailor always wears a black tie in perpetual memory of Lord Nelson. However, red being brighter, tradition is waived in its favor sometimes.

A UNIFORM dress for college girls has so thoroughly proved its worth that it is a pity the high schools, yes, and the public schools, could not adopt one too. If all the girl students could be uniformly clad, the problem of dressing their daughters for school would be solved for a great many parents and it would save the daughters themselves many heartburnings and envyings, where students of different social standing meet on common ground.

This little frock was elected to this page because the gingham of which it was made came in such lovely greens, and furthermore because the designer thought it deserved a couple of ruffles.

VOILENA

THE natural charm of cotton voile is greatly enhanced by the B.D.A. "Voilena" finish.

"Voilena" embodies the height of daintiness in light dresses, blouses, undies, and similar articles of ladies apparel.

"Voilena" may be obtained in plain and fancy effects in black and fashionable shades.

When buying cotton and woolen clothes, always ask for B.D.A. — if you would have the best.

The Songs Mother Used To Sing

Good songs, more especially the old familiar ones, will never die. How often we find ourselves carried back through the years to happy childhood by the strains of some never-to-be forgotten melody. Every home in the land should have a book of these old songs, that the children might learn to sing the ballads so popular with their parents and grandparents years ago.

Canada's Song Book

Contains a splendid selection of representative National Airs, Hymns, Rounds, Glees, Ballads, etc. Arranged with music for class singing in one or two parts.

You should get this book. By a special arrangement with the publishers, we are enabled to offer this book FREE to our new or renewing subscribers to the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Send in your subscription, and a copy of "CANADA'S SONG BOOK" will be mailed postpaid, without extra cost to you.

A Dutch play dress with smock and bloomers. The black sateen smock has pink flowers appliqued and green wool embroidery. The bloomers are pink sateen.

An Ideal Advertiser

ONCE upon a time there was an advertiser who got his copy in ahead of closing dates; he gave the publisher time for careful composition; making of cuts was never left until the "last gun," with the printer holding the presses and running up the publisher's bill. The advertiser always had plenty of time to make corrections and get exactly what he wanted in set-ups. There were no disputes about typographical errors and inadvertent insertions. When he O.K.'d a final proof, it was final. And the advertiser was always pleased with the attention and service the publisher gave him.

MORAL: No publisher can give an advertiser proper service unless copy is received early.

The Never Failing Supply

Always Ready
Fresh and Sweet

Keep a tin or two of Klim on the pantry shelf and you are always sure of a plentiful supply of pure pasteurized separated milk.

With KLIM in the house disappointments and delays are avoided, because it takes but a minute or two to mix a fresh supply to meet all requirements.

Company may drop in unexpectedly—the hot day may sour the milk—the bottle or jug may be accidentally tipped over, but there is no cause to worry with KLIM on hand.

KLIM has that natural flavor to which you are accustomed, because it is pure separated milk (without fat) from which only the water has been removed, leaving the solids in the form of a fine dry white powder, which will not sour or spoil and will keep indefinitely.

To make KLIM into a liquid again simply mix it with water according to directions.

Buy Klim from your Grocer, in the blue and white striped tins in half pound, pound and ten pound sizes.

Four hundred years ago they were a wandering people, and they are still. We hear of them first as horse-traders, horse-doctors, fiddlers, and the like. In those days, too, they had a reputation for slyness, and, too often, for dishonesty. They were highway-men in those days, and shoplifters, and though their punishment came heavy and often, they wandered on and on, changing their ways but little. The Gypsies' covered cart or wagon, their horses, and their dogs, journeyed on the highroad of every country. Their tents and camp-fires have made a "gypsy-night" in every country lane. There is the same love of music in the gypsy as ever, and the same love of gay colors and barbaric jewelry. It is true that the Gypsy men whom we see in this country no longer wear the picturesque costumes, the broad sashes, the peaked hats, the fancy vests, that used to distinguish them. But the Gypsy women look much the same. Gaily-covered kerchiefs form a head-dress, from under which their dark hair, almost always black, hangs in two thick braids.

The Gypsy woman wears much jewelry, most of it too gaudy, but often valuable.

This leads us to something strange, yet true—the gypsy nearly always has money. Yet is it any wonder, for who can match the gypsy as a trader, or who is a more successful bargainer?

What holds them together as a people? They seldom marry others than of their own race, and their wandering habit keeps them from making many close friends.

In this country, and in the United States, some of the gypsies have changed their mode of living. These spend their winters in towns or cities, many of them in houses of their own. But in the summer the wandering fever that is in the gypsy blood answers to the call of the open road, and the summer nights are lit again by their road-side camp-fires.

The gypsy is still the fortune-teller. By the lines of the hand, the stars in the sky, they ply their trade of foretelling the best of luck to all who are willing to pay for being told.

And though we say we don't believe a word of it, how many of us have entered the gypsy fortune-teller's tent, and crossed her hand with silver, listened, and wished, and wished the fortune would come true.

The Land of P'raps

They were sitting on the ground at the foot of a big straw-stack, on the very top of which stood the little If. His alarm-clock bell was ringing loudly, as it always did when the If needed help. After much coaxing, Diddy persuaded him to slide down the stack, which he did safely.

There were cooler days as they neared the end of the August road. Instead of fields of grain the road was bordered by orchards and groves, where already some of the leaves began to show a touch of red and yellow here and there. The sunshine seemed softer and kindlier, and to the travellers it seemed to be the most quietly beautiful part of the road along which they had journeyed.

They were almost to the last day of the August road, and were looking to see if there was not a gateway into September. But the pathway of the new month was marked by a plain name-stone only. As they passed on to the September road the travellers could see not far in the distance a gay procession, a parade, with flags flying, banners waving, and bands playing.

sort of modern Cassandra, disseminating the news of the day—news gathered in all the highways and by-ways and corridors of the hotel itself.

But, to my mind there is nothing quite so contemptible as a snob. In these unfortunate people is the mark of the cloven hoof and it will come out at most unexpected moments. They are afraid to make friends unless credentials are pasted upon their forehead and by this false discretion they miss some of the greatest blessings of life and deprive themselves of some of its sweetest friendships. If we, ourselves, are all right no associations can do us any harm socially or otherwise.

sharks you come to me to get you out of the soup. Well, I'll be a sport. Cory the same as ever?"

"He shaved a few days ago," answered Hayes. "But you know he'd never stand for having his picture taken."

"Not if he knew it, but he's simple enough to be fooled easily. Now listen, Frank. First rainy day you trade hair-cuts with Cory. Then he'll most likely shave. I'll be around a day or two later with that breaking plow of his, bring my kodak along and take a picture of that big colt of the bay mare's. He thinks a lot of it, and if you sneak away I'll get him to hold the colt on a rope while I snap it."

"He'll never—" began Hayes.

"He will if I bawl him out about keeping far enough away so's not to spoil the picture. He'll never suspect I'm taking him instead of the colt."

THINGS worked out as smoothly as the plotters had hoped. The hair-cutting over, Harrigan followed Hayes' example and shaved. And when Neighbor Frushing drove up the next day, before dinner, Harrigan was just ripe, as his hired man explained. The colt, and its unsuspecting owner, were duly photographed according to schedule.

"Frank tells me you're buying a wife by mail, you big simp," said the frank-spoken guest, while the men were having their after-dinner smoke.

"Yes. That's her picture over there between the shot-gun and the bread tin," assented Cory. "Frank stuck it there with candle grease."

"Frank's doing most of the courting for you, eh?"

"Sure. Words are more in his line than in mine. But we're telling that girl just the plain truth, so she'll have no kick coming."

"Not just the plain truth, Cory," corrected Hayes, "I'd call it the polished truth. I may have forgotten a few thousand good English words since I buried myself up here, but my memory is still good for ten or twelve thousand, and I'll use them all if need be to shoo Cupid this way."

"You babbling loony," advised Jo Frushing, "you should write that girl just two words, 'Keep Away'."

"If Frank did that," protested Harrigan, "I'd write her myself to come right along."

"I've got a letter half written now," commented Hayes, "I told her a lot of things she wanted to know, but I had to give my brain a rest before I could describe this house."

"Surely you didn't find it hard to describe this?"

"I guess I was getting pretty tired," apologized Hayes, "anyway I didn't seem able to think of the right synonyms."

"Synonyms!" fairly snorted Jo Frushing, "short of synonyms, eh. Here, get that letter, and, to give that brain of yours the rest it needs, I'll dictate and you'll write."

"Good," agreed Harrigan, "go to it, Frank."

So they went to it. The dictator commenced:

"Mr. Harrigan's 'house'—put that in between little commas up on top, Frank, you know what I mean, yes, that's it, quotation marks—no, better yet, write it in italics, it looks more sarcastic: Mr. Harrigan's house is a squat one-storey structure, with only one small window, and that facing north instead of south. The flooring is of hewn logs, the walls of pine logs which Mr. Harrigan did not bother to peel. The window cannot open, and the door, built of poles and gunny sacks, swings crazily on hinges made of old harness leather. At night it is kept closed by a prop made from a broken peavie. The door has neither handle, lock nor latch. At one end of the shack—change that to house, in italics as before, Frank—a score of poles strung on wire hang from the cross beams, and on these Mr. Harrigan stores his flour, sugar, salt, oatmeal, beans and other foodstuffs, to protect them, as far as possible, from ravages of rats and mice. From the rafters hang bacon, salt pork and dried venison. Dried fish is strung from the ridge pole to within eighteen inches of the floor, just out of rat reach. Hanging on the south wall—"

"Easy there, Jo, I'm no dictagraph," remonstrated Hayes. "Let me get it all down," and he went on writing in his particular style, which was:

"Mr. Harrigan's quarters are a modern adaptation of the Norwegian bungalow, with the English twelfth century system of diffused illumination, instead of the more common direct solar ray. The flooring is a remarkable specimen of adze work, while the massive

Only for ladies who end corns

Dainty shoes are only for those who end corns.

The way is simple, quick and easy, and is sure. Millions of people employ it.

Apply Blue-jay, the liquid or the plaster. That touch will stop the pain.

Then wait a little and the corn will loosen and come out.

Then why does anybody suffer corns?

Just because they don't know. They pare corns and keep them. Or they pad them. Or they use a treatment harsh and ineffective.

Blue-jay is scientific. This world-famed laboratory created it.

Year after year, it is keeping millions entirely free from corns.

Perhaps half the corns that start are now ended by it.

walls are solidly built of coniferous giants of the forest, in their natural state. The solidity of the illuminating orifice could not be surpassed, while the door (in which adequate provision for excluding atmospheric fridity has been so cunningly contrived that it in no way detracts from the rustic appearance which so harmonizes with the exterior of the bungalow) is supported by broad leathern thongs rendered supple by long preparation. A modern halberd bars ingress during the dark hours. The mezzanine floor is used—temporarily—as a store room and larder, adequate precautions being taken to exclude any of the smaller ranch animals from this part of the house. Without particularizing, we may say the mezzanine floor is amply stocked."

"Go on with the dictating, Jo. I've caught up," said Hayes.

"About time, too," was the response. "Now take this: The bed is wide enough for three men. Head and foot built of five-inch poles, sides of split six-inch poles. Small poles are used for slats, and half a bale of swamp hay is the mattress. Once a year the mattress is turned over and shaken up with a pitchfork. For a pillow Harrigan uses his coat. The blankets are all wool and all torn. There are no sheets."

"Nobody has sheets in this country," remarked Harrigan.

"That may be true," was the answer, "but that girl doesn't know it. She'd look fine between those blankets." Harrigan gazed at the blankets reflectively.

Hayes was busy writing:

"The bed is a massive Elizabethan four-poster, of extra generous size and depth. The mattress is of Quesnel excelsior, a material of such resiliency that it requires turning over only at long intervals, and this is easily accomplished with an implement specially designed for that purpose. Mr. Harrigan prefers to sleep without a pillow. The bedding, without exception, is the most famous manufactured for the Hudson's Bay Company, and has been found satisfactory after severe and thorough tests."

"Come on, Jo, give me more words. You're doing fine," said Hayes.

"There's mighty little furniture, and what there is is fierce. The side of an old wagon box, eleven feet by three, is used for a table. The butt ends of firewood logs serve instead of chairs. A packing case nailed to the wall is a pantry, a prune box is used for a cupboard, while for a chest of drawers three coal oil cases are pressed into service. An iron range, propped up with stones where a leg is broken off, and innocent of stove polish since the day it left the factory, completes the list. Behind the stove is piled a stack of cordwood reaching to the ceiling. On windy days the chimney smokes, on rainy days it leaks. A coal oil can fitted with a twisted wire handle, serves for a kettle, a ten-pound lard pail is a porridge pot, a coal oil can opened lengthways is a wash boiler, a coal oil can with a wooden handle is the water pail, and another coal oil can, with the edges rolled back, is the wash basin, which sits on the cordwood behind the stove. Tin plates and tin cups take the place of crockery, and the knives, forks and spoons are bent, twisted and broken. For tough meat Harrigan has to use his jack-knife."

Hayes was making good progress with his polished truth:

"The house is furnished in the strict Spartan style, convenience rather than ostentation being aimed at in every instance. The table is of Studebaker manufacture, set on pedestals of unusual solidity. The remainder of the furniture inclines to the Mission style, and is entirely built of woods imported direct from Southern Oregon and California. The culinary department boasts one of the finest malleable ranges procurable, and still in the condition it left the factory, except for some ornamental stucco work around the base. By a clever arrangement, a generous supply of fuel is stored immediately in the rear of the range, where ablutatory provision has also been made. The chimney is distinctly modern. All cooking vessels are of the famous XXXX rolled white metal. The dinner service and cutlery were specially chosen to give to the Studebaker table that finish and éclat so eagerly desired and so rarely attained. A special cutlery service is kept in reserve for venison and ursa meats."

"A profusion of trophies of the chase make a conspicuous showing, together with taxidermists' tools and fine specimens of the armourer's art. Two shapely Scandinavian skis are almost eclipsed by a splendid pair of French-Canadian patte d'ours, while directly across hangs the prized picture of Mr. Harrigan's collection, a superb reproduction of Sir John Millais' "Bubbles," procured after considerable expense early in the fall nine years ago."

"A stable lantern, which by day stands on a case of blasting powder, hangs at night on a length of wire dangling over the table. A broken looking glass flashes a faded invitation to 'Drink Unicorn Whiskey.' A couple of mail order catalogues, a patent medicine almanack, a seed catalogue, and a veterinary pamphlet, seem to be all the reading matter."

"We also got that length of poetry Frank wrote between the towel and the looking glass," supplemented Harrigan.

"That's just matter, not reading matter," said Jo Frushing.

"Oh, it's not so rotten as all that," defended Hayes, without looking up from his screed:

"Evening illumination is diffused by a central hanging lamp modelled on simple yet chaste lines. Another article, which visitors never fail to notice is the octagonal mirror, the gift of a spiritual friend. The latest editions of the Canadian encyclopedia are the most eagerly perused books in Mr. Harrigan's library, which by the way, contains several volumes of a highly technical nature."

"The general appearance of the place," continued the dictator, when Hayes looked up, "indicates carelessness and neglect of the crassest kind. Dirt is here and dust is there. The floor has not been scrubbed nor the windows cleaned since the house was built. The litter is piled in such rank disorder that one glance at it would break the heart of any woman unused to the ways of the bachelor of the northern ranches."

Hayes had transcribed:

"Although furnished without regard to expense, Mr. Harrigan's domicile yet shows in an indefinable way that something is missing, that intangible atmosphere which the presence of a good woman alone can bring. A mistress in the home will undoubtedly mean many changes, in which Mr. Harrigan will gladly acquiesce."

"See anything else, Jo?"

"I see a lot of junk, but I've no more time to spend here. I must be going."

Hayes ended his letter with a flourish.

"There is also a miscellany of paraphernalia unnecessary to detail."

Then he went out to hitch up Jo's team.

The man smiled in the dark. "Oh," she continued, her voice trembling a little, "even if you thought you meant what you said,—why, think of us all! We are only poor travelling people, a branch of the great army that works for the poor. We go from place to place as we are sent. My step-father preaches, and I—I sing. They tell me I do right in that—and indeed all those dear tired people try to do right. Yes, even my step-father tries, and they live the religious life as best they can in their own way. Many are the souls they help, for I have seen it."

The man made a quick movement toward her and lifted her face with his hands turning it up to the moonlight.

"Listen," he said, "and let me look at you, you strange little one,—you beauty! See, I will tell you something. I have had most everything in my life but Religion. Maybe the time has come when I need that. There's a verse, ain't there, which says, 'Confess your sins, and—' He is faithful and just to forgive you your sins.' I reckon I don't get it just right, but that's the idea as I remember it. Well then, I take it at its word. I confess; I own up to the lot. When it comes to the commandments,

Let Your Own Ear Be the Judge

Hear the Phonograph First,
Then—Listen to the Salesman

You do not require to be a musical critic to detect the vast difference in tone quality in the various phonographs.

The Sonora's supremacy of tone is perceptible to the untrained ear. This matchless tone—sweet, clear, true and incomparably lovely—was recognized at the Panama-Pacific Exposition by the only jury which heard and tested all the phonographs exhibited. This jury recommended that the Sonora be given a marking for tone quality higher than that given to any other phonograph or talking machine.

The Sonora plays all disc records. Its cabinets are wonderfully beautiful—exhibiting in many models the famous "bulge" design (made by a patented process).

The Sonora is famous for its extra-long-running, silent, powerful motor.

Hear the Sonora in critical comparison. Let your ear judge of its tone supremacy.

why—when it comes to the commandments!—Say, do you recollect that fellow in the New Testament who boasted, 'All these have I kept from my youth up?'

She nodded.

"The difference with me is,—I would have answered in his place, 'All these have I broken from my youth up.'"

With an impulsive movement, and a little distressed cry the girl clasped her hands around his arm.

"Not all?" she said, "Oh! not all!"

The ranchman gave a shrug.

"And if I had?" he questioned, bending lower, "If I had—what then? Would it finish me—with you?"

"With me?" she echoed, "No; not with me, and surely not with Him—if you are sorry."

"Well," he said reflectively, "Now's the time to get things straight. I reckon I have broken most all of them. Not that one about, 'False witness against your neighbor,' or 'Thou shalt not steal.' And I never committed murder, but—" he looked down at his strong, sun-tanned hands, "I've settled a few scores with my enemies, according to the old Rabbinical law, 'An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth!' Will you let it go at that?"

She looked up into his face that was grave and frankly in earnest.

"No, you need not tell me," she said, with a quick catch of her breath. "I do not want to hear. It is past. It makes no difference."

A light that was not of the silver radiance of the moon shone across his face.

"Do you mean it?" he cried softly, "those last words 'it makes no difference'?"

"Yes! Yes I do," she assented hurriedly, and drawing away, "but I must go! they will look for me, they will miss me. You must understand,—I cannot stay."

Cyclone Bill stooped down and where the light touched some low bushes, he broke off a branch of blossoms and handed it to her. As the slight fingers touched his, he caught them in his own and held them firmly.

"Below here, twelve miles or so, lies the ranch where I live," he said, "It is mine, and there's a lot of it. You can ride over it for a few days and not reach its border. It's wild and ungodly quiet, most of the time. That isn't a thing I have minded in the past,—But now. Well,—back of the ranch are the mountains, the Grand Canyon and acres of condensed loneliness. It never got me before, but I reckon it would perhaps if I went back alone this time. The cattle and ponies that bear my mark are all half wild, and the men who round them up are the same. Some of them are good fellows at heart, and some the devil's own. Now and then we have a little trouble with the Indians. You never can tell about them. Anyhow I guess after to-night I'd find it one too many to live out there alone. I want you to go back with me,—to marry me—just as things stand to-night. I want you, the sweetness of your eyes, your voice, yourself."

The girl swayed, then steadied and gave a quick upward smile. She shook her head from which the bonnet had fallen. The moonlight caught the bronze waves of her hair. "They could not let me," she said tremulously. "Oh! never! Neither my little mother, nor her husband. Not even if you—and I—. Often and often I have heard them say they would never consent to let me marry anyone who did not have Religion. And they were in earnest."

Cyclone Bill laughed, a boyish laugh—

"Sets the wind in that quarter?" he answered, "Religion! If it's that—why then, I'll get it!"

"Oh!" she exclaimed unhappily, you could not,—I mean, you could not get Religion, just because of me!"

"Could I not?" he questioned, "And why then? Religion means being square, doing the right thing whether you want to or not,—and usually you do not. Religion means thinking of the other chap first. It ain't served out the same to everyone of us. But mine,—Well,—I reckon it would make me swear less, drink less and root less, sweetheart! Anyhow, I'm going to have you, so if that's the price I'll pay in Religion."

Did You Ever Try the Worry Cure?

By BETTY O'HARA

WORK never hurts anyone; it is worry that brings us all to an early grave. But did you ever think how useless it is to try to stop worrying before you have diagnosed your own special case? Did you ever think what a hopeless task you set for yourself when you make up your mind to stop worrying before you try to remove the cause of it?

Did you ever consider that three-quarters of the worry of this world is caused by wanting something that we haven't got, or by our own dissatisfied natures. For when we really think of things seriously, how many of us lack necessary food or clothing or a roof of some kind over our heads? And these are the three necessities which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred are provided for us; yet we are not satisfied. We see someone else who has a much prettier house selves into debt and useless, endless worry. They can't sleep nights, they begin to look tired, lose their "pep," haven't the energy for the fun they used to have, and make themselves generally miserable. That is the way they must pay their luxury tax.

It is our right to have pretty clothes, to have good times, to be happy, and the only reason we haven't these things is because we don't go about it the right way. We try to reach the top of the ladder without stepping on the lower rounds, we try to decorate the house before we have finished the foundation. Instead of securing the money to buy the things we wish, we obtain them and then trust to luck that some kind angel will drop a five, fifty, or a hundred dollar bill into our outstretched hand. But what most of us receive is trouble, and—well we deserve it.

Still Beautiful by Candle-Light

BUT the pitiless light of day tells a different story. Lips have lost their soft, red pout—the mouth seems hard and old; while the ivory pillar of her throat shows the subtle marks of Time.

It is in the withering of the tissues of mouth and throat that age is first revealed. The degeneration of tissue that comes with Pyorrhea is not unlike the degeneration of age.

The gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted. The final stage of Pyorrhea is a repulsive toothlessness that brings sagging muscles and sunken cheeks.

Don't let Pyorrhea become established in your mouth. Remember—this insidious disease of the gums is a menace to your health as well as to your beauty. To its infecting germs have been traced many of the ills of middle age.

Visit your dentist often for tooth and gum inspection.

Watch your gums for tenderness and bleeding (the first symptom of Pyorrhea) and use Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

than ours, we immediately figure out that if they can afford it, so can we. And we move into a better locality, have to pay a much higher rent, and instead of being happier, we can't do our housework the way we did before; and altogether the monthly expenses rise enormously, and we worry. How can we pay our bills?

Another man in the country wants a car because his neighbor has one. He is bound to have one, he mortgages his farm, gets his car, up goes the price of gasoline, an axle breaks, his troubles begin. How can he pay his bills? Then the mother has her days of worry. The children should have new dresses, the old ones are not worn out, but she is sick and tired of looking at them. Besides, the children across the way have just gone out in such dainty new dresses and—well her children don't have to look shabby. So she takes the money she has been saving for a washing machine, buys the dresses, and immediately is forced to swear allegiance to that worry breeder, the installment store, for the washing machine.

The girl in the office, the girl on the farm, girls everywhere, try to get what other girls have. They want a new suit or a pretty bedroom, like their very best friend. They want everything, anything. They try to obtain a luxury by giving up a necessity, and find to their sorrow that they have miscalculated, and run them-

"But what would you do?" a bright little miss asks, as she looks at me with her head on one side. To her and to all girls I would say: "Never even think of wanting anything until you have the money in your own hand, not money you have borrowed, but money you have earned. It is the only way to get the full value out of your pleasures."

"And how can I earn any money?" the girl in the small town enquires. "I can't leave home, and if I could, I haven't had any training in the business world. So what is the use of thinking about it? I suppose I am doomed to accept what fortune sends me and be happy."

Yes, you are supposed to be happy, we all are, but if you want to sit back and take what fortune sends you—well, you have a poor chance for happiness. If you really want pretty things that other girls have, you can have them. You don't need to leave home, you don't need business ability, you don't need to give one full day a week. Our Carry-On Club has been formed to help just the girls and women who cannot give their full time to business, yet who want to earn money. Don't buy on installment plan, don't envy other girls' pretty clothes, don't worry. Just have what you want and be happy, for the Carry-On Club is waiting to tell you how. Write to-day to

TO say that a motor improves with use may sound paradoxical. But owners, after years of use, say this is their actual experience with Willys-Knight motors.

The Willys-Knight motor receives its gas through openings in sliding sleeves mechanically operated. It has no clashing valves. A gradual accumulation of carbon, between the sleeves, seals the compression more tightly. In power and quietness, the motor thus improves with use.

That explains why owners so universally declare, the Willys-Knight runs better the longer it runs.

The way to whiter teeth

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Women should test this new method of teeth cleaning. They usually decide the family tooth paste. Tooth protection depends largely on them.

There are new facts to consider. And every woman, for her sake and her family's sake, should prove them.

That film-coat

Most tooth troubles are now traced to film. To that viscous film which you feel with your tongue. Millions of teeth are dimmed and ruined by it.

Film clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it, so the tooth brush leaves much of it.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So, despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Now we combat it

Dental science has for years sought a way to fight that film. Not on the surface only, but between the teeth.

That way has now been found. Able authorities have amply proved it. The method is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. To millions it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning, and leading dentists everywhere are urging its daily use.

Ask for a ten-day tube

Everyone is welcome to a test of Pepsodent. Watch the results, read the reasons for them, then judge it for yourself.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

A new discovery makes this method possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has found a harmless activating method, and active pepsin can be used to fight this film.

Pepsodent combines two other modern requisites. And these three great factors do what nothing else has done.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

You will know then what is best for you and yours. Cut out the coupon now. This is too important to forget.

the right kind of nurses would undertake the work he would give his first consideration to that solution of it. Results followed quickly, and there are now in the northern district the only two district nurses in the Dominion of Canada, nurses licensed by the Public Health especially for maternity work. One of these nurses is stationed at Waterhole in the Fairview municipality, and is a direct result of a petition and agitation from the Women's Institute there. Waterhole now boasts a doctor, too, but at the time the nurse came the nearest doctor was fifty miles away.

Griffen Creek, which had neither telephone nor telegraph connection with the outside world, followed soon with another petition, headed by Mrs. Little, wife of the Anglican minister there, who worked unceasingly for it.

These nurses are trained in general nursing, with a special obstetrical course taken at one of the best hospitals on the continent. At the beginning of the war both volunteered for work in France, and for four years did splendid service, mostly among the civilian population. They have therefore a wide and varied experience, which especially fits them for the handicaps incidental to work in a pioneer country.

NOVA SCOTIA WOMEN'S INSTITUTES.

THE spring report of the Institutes shows an active interest in gardening, the care and raising of poultry, school gardens and school improvement campaigns. A clean-up day is a feature of Institute work in some localities, and it grows in popularity and importance each year. It is most inspiring to read the reports which come in steadily from the Institutes. The members work hard, with no thought of reward or spectacular glory, but the sum total of their work throughout the province shows that the ideal of "Home and Country" is well worth the effort expended.

We welcome two new Institutes in King's County. One at Medford, and the other at Cambridge. We are quite sure that these new Institutes will be splendid aids to our work.

A number of the Institutes are small in number, their members busy housewives who have to drive some distance to the meetings. When these handicaps are considered, one wonders how they accomplish so much; but as is often the case, it is the busy woman who can find time to do a little more.

Detailed reports of the Institutes as gathered from their reports follow:

Arcadia is still interested in their school, and recently sanitary towels were supplied to the school by the Institute. A pie social held brought them the sum of $17.30, and the young people of the place held a St. Patrick's Party and handed over the sum of $11.50 to the Institute.

Bridgetown Institute is sewing and caring for needy children in their town, and is interested in Social Service. Their April meeting included the report of the delegate who had attended the Social Service meeting in Halifax. The Roll Call at the last meeting was responded to by quotations on "Friendship." A resolution was passed that the Institute do all the hemming of sheets and pillow cases for the new Dawson Memorial Hospital.

Bible Hill Institute is interested in Community Improvement. A special committee appointed for that work decided to confine their energies to the school grounds this year. May 5th was set as Arbor Day, and all the people in the community were invited to the school grounds to assist in the work. Men and women and boys and girls were present and all interested. Several teams worked all day hauling gravel to make a new roadway. Several donations of shrubs and trees were gratefully received. Mr. Allen, of the Horticultural Department of the College, has the work in hand, and has given much time and assistance to the Institute. They hope to make the grounds an example as a model rural school ground. A committee of ladies served refreshments during the afternoon, which were greatly appreciated. The W.I. on Bible Hill looks forward to great progress in the future.

Brookfield is preparing for its school exhibition, which is held in the autumn.

Bear River is interested in the sanitary condition of the school; also the need of fire escapes to the school building was brought forward by the Institute.

Gaspereaux, one of our new Institutes, is growing. School and community improvement is being undertaken.

Caledonia also is interested in school and community improvement. "In Times Like These," by Mrs. Nellie McClung, is being read and discussed at their meetings.

Halfway River Institute is interested in helping the needy in their district.

Lakeville Institute is reviving after a trying winter of meetings interrupted by storms and sickness. They have taken as their objective the care of an unfortunate child in their locality.

Lawrencetown always has a fine school exhibition under the auspices of the Institute. Members of the Institute give instruction and assistance to the pupils in sewing, cooking and canning. A short course in cookery is planned for the summer. They are also interested in starting a supervised playground this summer.

Oxford Institute has been busy caring for families who were left destitute by a bad fire in their town. Money, clothing, bedding and furniture were collected and given to the sufferers. They report, with pleasure, that those families are now comfortably situated and grateful to the Women's Institute for its timely assistance. The Institute there does much to help others; and it has become an important factor in the community life.

Port Williams has had a most instructive talk by an expert on "Care of the Teeth." Grand Pre also had the same talk, and derived much benefit from it. Both of these Institutes are greatly interested in Social Service work.

Point Edward, one of our new Institutes, is making plans to improve the school-house by painting and putting in a new foundation to the building.

Paradise is interested in school and community improvement. A pump with fittings has been recently installed in the school by the Institute. They are now taking over the care of the cemetery. The memorial to their boys is to take the form of entrance gates to the cemetery.

AGRICULTURAL POLICY OF FEDERATED INSTITUTES.

THERE isn't a Women's Institute nor a Homemakers' Club in Canada that would not be interested in the fine policy laid down by Mrs. Laura Rose Stephen, of Huntingdon, Quebec, the convener of the Agricultural Committee of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada. Mrs. Stephen is the most prominent woman agriculturist in Canada to-day. Her book, "Farm Dairy," is rated as one of the best of its kind in the English language. She is a veteran lecturer on agricultural subjects; she is a pioneer in Women's Institute work, having organized these societies in British Columbia and Nova Scotia. She is a writer on agricultural topics, and the Federated Women's Institutes have reason to be proud of having such an outstanding and active woman as convener of this most important department of their work.

Mrs. Stephen is at present on a lecture tour in Ontario. She has divided her lectures into two groups—practical and ethical—and each Institute makes a choice of one of each group. The topics are: "Kitchen Ways and Wrinkles" (illustrated); "How to Construct and Use a Home-made Fireless Cooker" (illustrated); "A Woman's Problems on a Dairy Farm," "Dainty Frozen Dishes," "Nurture versus Nature," "Living a Life is More Than Making a Living," "When a Girl Marries," and "Making Our House a Better Home."

Every Institute member is asked to study the following policy and see if it can be applied in her own locality:

Educational.

(a) To stimulate the teaching of agriculture in schools.

(b) To agitate for suitable text books along various agricultural lines, and for interesting books on agriculture and nature study for supplementary reading.

(c) To have interesting books on agriculture with good illustrations (colored where possible) put in the libraries of the schools and also in the Women's Institute libraries that are sent out through the country.

(f) To give every assistance possible to the district agricultural representatives and teachers before, during and after school fairs. Parents should see that vegetables, flowers, etc., are properly prepared and classified by their children.

(g) To establish rules that, where children care for live stock, gardens, etc., they should share in the revenue from such, and if they take prizes, the children's, not the parents', names should appear in the prize lists, and they should receive the rewards.

(h) To work for the improvement of school grounds and the establishment and laying out of recreation centres. This might be accomplished by having a school field day, with picnic and games following the improvement work.

(i) To urge that all courses in the agricultural schools and colleges be open to women, and to educate the public that all women's honest work and endeavor is honorable and dignified, whether it be growing a beautiful flower or rearing a prize heifer.

Practical.

(a) To encourage women to take up suitable branches of farming: dairying, poultry, bee-keeping, flower culture, small fruit growing, market gardening, etc. For girls on a farm a good way to get them started is to pledge them a definitely stated moneyed interest in the business.

(b) To submit the results of agricultural successes or failures to the local Superintendent of Agriculture to be forwarded to the Federated Institutes Superintendent of Agriculture that she may use same for the benefit of the women of the Dominion.

(c) To create market circles and centres for the economic collecting and disposing of farm products, where such do not exist.

(d) To assist by word and work in securing a better quality of raw material for our milk distributors and dairy manufactories. For the health of our people, the Women's Institutes should feel their responsibility in this vital food problem.

(e) To urge that women have a place on agricultural fair boards.

(f) That women take an active and helpful interest in their local fairs, and by exhibiting and acting as competent judges, etc., stimulate this highly educative means of raising the standards of agricultural products.

(g) To encourage the Provincial and Dominion Governments in the Government grading of produce. With a Government stamp on butter, eggs, etc., they can command a definite price in any market. Grading puts premium on the good, and effectively denounces the bad.

(h) To make a survey of each particular district as to what might be profitably produced, so as to make an established market of high reputation for some special line; also to encourage production where there is an insufficient supply of some staple product.

(i) To urge that where workmen's houses are erected in villages or towns, grounds for good-sized gardens around the houses be provided, where vegetables and fruit for the family may be grown, thus adding much to their thrift and health, and incidentally a safe play-ground for the children be provided.

(j) To promote a more general interest in the care and beautifying of public highways, parks, grounds surrounding public buildings, and the more immediate home environment by:

1. Removal of rubbish.
2. Cutting and burning of weeds.
3. Setting out and pruning trees.
4. Levelling and mowing lawns.
5. Planting and plotting of flower beds.
6. An insistent agitation for good roads.

THE WORK OF THREE ONTARIO INSTITUTES.

ONE of the lecturers who visited some of the Eastern Ontario Institutes in June found many interesting things to report. The following notes are taken from what she has to say of the work of three Institutes:

Bubble Grains in Milk

Don't put aside your Puffed Grains when breakfast ends in summer. Children want them all day long, and there's nothing better for them.

The supreme dish for luncheon or for supper is Puffed Wheat in milk. The airy grains—puffed to eight times normal size—taste like food confections. Yet every morsel is whole wheat, with every food cell blasted.

The finest foods ever created

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are the finest grain foods in existence.

Never were cereals so enticing. The grains are fairy-like in texture, the flavor is like nuts. They seem like tidbits, made only to entice.

Yet they are major foods, with every food cell steam-exploded, so digestion is easy and complete.

They will take the place of pastries, sweets, etc., if you serve them all day long. And at meal-time they will make whole-grain foods tempting.

responsibilities. We had a splendid meeting, making up in enthusiasm what we lacked in numbers. It's a busy time in the country. There is a beautiful little cemetery here, which has been cared for by the Institute for some years. This year they have engaged a man for four months at $50 a month. He comes in the morning and stays all day, devoting all his time to the work of keeping it in splendid order. They are paying this salary by raising funds in one way and another. I am going to tell you of one rather interesting way in which they realized $50. The Institute members made a number of tiny aprons about eight inches square. They were made of print or cotton goods—just scraps which they had in the house. These aprons were complete in every detail, even to a pocket. In the pocket of each was placed a tiny note with these words:

"This little apron is sent to you, And this is what we wish you to do: Measure your waist-line inch by inch, And see that the tape line does not pinch, And for each small inch you measure round Place one cent in the pocket sound, And the money you so freely pay Will be used by the Institute in the wisest way."

"This Branch is also erecting a splendid Canadian granite monument to our fallen heroes. It is to be an impressive affair. The names are to have the opportunity to be treated by members of their own sex, it has grown from a little mission dispensary to a modern well-equipped hospital of 52 beds and 25 baby cots, with a standard training school for nurses included. From the Mission on Sackville Street it moved to a small property on Seaton Street where, in addition to the dispensary, the small beginning of a real hospital was made. This was in 1911 and in 1914 the response of womankind to the opportunity offered was so great that the fine property was bought at 125 Rusholme Road. This, too, was soon outgrown and in November, 1918, the beautiful new wing, which had already done signal service to the city as an emergency hospital, during the influenza epidemic, was formally opened, giving the institution the capacity it has to-day.

The equipment is most up-to-date, with a fine operating suite of six rooms, an X-ray room, accouchement room, pathological laboratory, clinic rooms, and waiting room, as well as private, semi-private and public wards. These latter are all bright and airy and attractive in colour and furnishing.

The personnel of the staff included, last year, superintendent, supervisor and instructor of nurses, night superintendent, dietitian, secretary treasurer, 15 nurses in training, four probationers. There were also two house doctors.

During the year 842 patients were admitted to the hospital, of whom 165 be inset in steel, quite a new idea, but very durable, and the effect is wonderful. It is to cost about $1,200—quite an undertaking. It will stand in the centre of the cemetery on an elevation of land and in such a position that all names can be seen from the road. They are taxing each plot owner $2, and contributions are coming from those who have left the district and settled in other parts of Canada.

"South Augusta is a new branch organized in March. They have a membership of 19 splendid women. We had an evening meeting when 55 men and women came out. They are going to try for a community hall. The men were intensely interested in it too and I believe this Branch will do a good work.

"The Athens Branch has done much for the community already. They have placed new seats in the little park, financed a fall fair for Public School, pay salary of Librarian and are now collecting for a Museum for their Town Hall. This year they are giving prizes for the best kept lawn during June, July and August. The competitors must send their names to the secretary. She hands these to a committee of ladies (who have not lawns of their own) who are to visit all the lawns and report those in the running to the judges who are to be selected from the townsmen."

WOMEN'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL APPEAL.

"WOMAN'S Work for Woman's Need" is a slogan which well expresses the spirit, as well as the practical accomplishment, of the Women's College Hospital at 125 Rusholme Road, Toronto. Begun in 1896, through the conviction of a woman medical student, now Dr. Anna McFee of New York, that sick women ought were public ward patients. There were 248 babies born in the hospital. This was an increase over the previous year of 234 patients and 92 births.

The patients have been by no means confined to Toronto. They have come from all over the province, for to a sensitive woman the opportunity of being cared for by one of her own sex counts for a very great deal. Often indeed it is the decisive factor in whether, or not, she shall let a disease run its painful, and frequently fatal course, or whether she shall have it treated and arrested in the early stages.

Women's Institute members have been among those who recognize this fact and who are eager to help an institution whose remarkable growth and success has been largely founded on the faith that necessary funds could not but come to a work so courageously begun and sincerely and laboriously carried on for the benefit of womankind. They have sent many welcome gifts of fruit, vegetables and all kinds of farm produce, as well as money, and in these days of high prices, their help is increasingly necessary. Gifts of the sort have come, since January 1st, 1918, from Women's Institutes at Lansdowne, Galt, Burgessville, Bartonville, Middleville, Markdale, Cobocok, Hampton, Shakespeare, Windermere, Caistor Centre, Silverwater, Woodville, Chatham, Perth, Creemore, Schomberg, Cainsville, Balmoral, Gorrie, Maple, Sunderland, Milton, Cobden, Moose Creek, Oakville, West Hill, Stouffville and Stevensville.

Won't you add the name of your Institute to this list? And you who have helped so much in former years will certainly not fail the Hospital this year in the effort to do a Woman's Work for Women's Need.

THIS TREAD CONSERVES TIRES

Goodyear Service Plan

Provides a Bonus of Mileage Greater than any Discount in Price You could Hope to Secure

The development of the All-Weather Tread is in keeping with Goodyear policy—to conserve tires; to get for motorists greater mileage and so lower cost-per-mile; to disregard price if the cost-per-mile is lowered.

The All-Weather Tread is tough and long-wearing, adding extra miles. It resists punctures and cuts, which, so frequently neglected, let in water and sand to rot the fabric. This tread combats skidding, which wears down the tread and weakens the tire carcass.

Its adaptability for all-wheel use aids further in tire-saving. No tire change you may make spoils the balanced appearance of your car. This permits balanced wear on all tires.

This tread is one factor in the Goodyear Conservation plan. This plan embraces many other Goodyear Tire Savers which prevent or cure tire injuries, and definite, personal help from Goodyear Service Station Dealers in securing a lower tire cost-per-mile.

Because of steadily increased quality with the mileage-making service of Goodyear Service Station Dealers (which means lower cost-per-mile), Goodyear Tires have become the largest selling brand in the world. This gives a final tire-cost below that of any tire which sacrifices quality or service to achieve a lower price or "special discount."

We've Solved the "Outhouse" Problem—Now's the Time for You to Investigate

The "outhouse" means discomfort, disease, unsanitary conditions—everything disagreeable. Kaustine Waterless Toilets mean comfort, cleanliness, privacy, perfect sanitation. Then why put up with the old "outhouse" another day when you can have an indoor toilet like folks in the city have?

A Kaustine Waterless Toilet costs less than fifty bushels of wheat to buy and install. And it is a complete sewage disposal system.

Looks like the water-closet used in the city. Just as efficient and sanitary. Bowl is of white, washable china—scientifically ventilated. Kaustine—the chemical used, is the most powerful disintegrating agent known. Absolutely no odor. Absolutely no trouble. Requires less than two hours' attention each year.

There are over 50,000 Kaustine Waterless Toilets in use—in schools and factories as well as farm-homes. Every installation covered by our positive long-term guarantee of absolute satisfaction.

One of these installations is near you. Let's tell you about it. Let's send you our literature—with complete illustrations. Let's send you typical testimonials. Let us show you how in a few hours—before winter sets in—you can install a modern convenient, sanitary toilet indoors. Send the coupon—or a post-card—now.

SOME REASONS FOR CONSOLIDATED SCHOOLS.

The question of Consolidated Schools is one which is taking the attention of a good many Institutes at the present time, and we give here-with extracts from an address on the subject by Mr. MacLaren at one of the last Institute Conventions:

Address by Mr. MacLaren.

I want to show how we have been led up to this question of the consolidation of rural schools from time to time, away back, when school work was carried on by the itinerant school teacher, who travelled around from home to home in the old settlement days; he would spend a short time in this home, teaching the boys and girls and father and mother, and then move on to the next and so on. There were a lot of good things connected with that, because he actually lived with the family and knew conditions. Then the time came when there were so many settlers in the country that it was necessary to gather the children together, and, while the teacher lived in the home of the parents, he had a separate school building. When Dr. Ryerson became Minister of Education, he standardized these schools, and formed the country into sections, so that they might be taxed for the up-keep of the school in that section. Previously it had been left entirely to local initiative. It was necessary to establish schools in the smallest districts so that the children would not have too far to walk. There was a school in every district within a radius of two to two and a half miles.

That has gone on until the present day in Ontario. For certain reasons, we are gradually becoming dissatisfied with that system. I want to point out a few of the reasons why we are dissatisfied with the district system and are putting forth another system of schools.

The first is the depopulation in rural districts. I went into a school in Durham County about two years ago, and there were two boys. We asked the teacher if that was all she had on the roll; she said, "No, we have another boy and he is a brother of these two." In another school there were the teacher and one boy. The same thing is true all over the country. That is a serious condition and is one of the reasons that have caused us to look around for a solution of the problem.

The second thing is the possibility of local jealousies interfering with the educational programme. At the present time there is a section in Ontario where it would be possible to consolidate the schools, if it were not for a little jealousy between the two churches.

Then the third thing is the constant changing of school teachers. It is said almost half of our rural school teachers change every year. There are a number of reasons for that; first, the salary, second, the special life; third, the question of board. Then, with the small number of children attending the schools, there is no inspiration for the teacher.

Then there is the changing social and economic conditions. It was all right to have a one-room school in the little settlement, set off by itself without any communication with the rest of the world, but to-day our interests are enlarged. You cannot take any one school section in any part of the Province and isolate it. It has connection with all the country around it.

Our ideas of education are changing. It was all right to teach just the three R's in the past, but now we have men coming along and suggesting there should be Domestic Science, Manual Training, Agriculture, taught in the schools, and that we should have school gardens and hot lunches and all kinds of things which we recognize as being for the progress and improvement of our boys and girls. We have to change our system to adapt ourselves to these new demands.

Then there is another thing—inequalities in educational opportunity. Nobody who knows the situation in rural Ontario can claim that the country boy or girl is getting anything like an equal opportunity of education that the boy or girl gets who lives in the towns or cities. Then there is inequality of taxation. In a recent survey it was found there were two school sections in a district; in one the rate was one mill, in the next it was 15 mills; in one section the assessment was a few thousand dollars; in the other it was a number of hundreds of thousands of dollars. You cannot expect to give the pupils in that one section the same opportunities as the pupils in the other, and we are not educating the boys and girls for the school section, but for the state at large.

Then the number of recitations in a school is another question. In 18 schools, we found there was one school teacher who was having 34 recitations a day. The average in these 18 schools was 24 recitations a day; the average time was something like ten minutes to a recitation. How can you expect one teacher to hold 24 recitations a day, besides undertaking the regular work of the school, taking an interest in school gardens and agriculture, manual training, domestic science, and being a community leader? It is impossible.

The consolidation of rural schools simply means bringing together two, three, four or five into one central school, and then drawing the children to that central point in a wagon every day during the cold season.

Here are some of the advantages that will come from this consolidation. First of all, there is the better grading and classification of the pupils. Instead of having the one teacher for the whole schools from the primary up to the senior fourth, the children are graded and put in separate rooms. Then, the second advantage is, you can get high school education right in your own district, without your boys and girls going away from under the home influence at one of the most impressionable and important times of their lives. We hope the time will come when everyone of the consolidated schools will take the whole High School course in its curriculum. If anyone of you have travelled on the trains to the High Schools and back to the rural districts, you will have some idea of the dangers that face these boys and girls. Some of them travel from seven in the morning and don't get back until seven or eight o'clock at night, and they hang around the town waiting for their evening train, or else they go to town and live there all week and only come home for Sunday.

The next advantage is that there will be medical and dental inspection in every one of the consolidated schools. The Act reads that the school shall have medical inspection twice a year, and dental inspection once a year, by a duly qualified physician and dentist.

Then there is the possibility of arranging a Teacherage, where the teachers can live in a home on the school grounds. This will enable you to pay a higher salary to your teachers, and principal, attracting married men as your principal who will set up a home there and provide the board for the assistant teachers.

Then there comes the question of good roads. If you get your consolidated school, you get good roads, because there is an attitude to make the roads better for the children to travel to school. It is bound to come, and has come in the United States and the other Provinces of Canada—good roads have followed the consolidation of schools.

It has been the experience, wherever consolidation is established, that there is a larger enrollment. In one district, where previously there were only three children over the age of 14, after consolidation there were 65. No new children had come into that school section, but the children who had been there before had started to school again. Not only is the enrollment enlarged, but the average attendance is enlarged. With our present statistics, our average attendance is about 55 or 65 per cent. under the ordinary school system. That means that from 35 to 45 children out of every hundred are at home every day in the year. Put that up against some of the other countries and you will see where we are coming to. As soon as consolidation takes place, that average attendance will jump up to 75 and 85 per cent. and, in some cases, 90 per cent.

The next thing is the equipment that it is possible to secure for these consolidated schools. It states in the regulations that, unless for reasons sufficient to the Minister of Education there shall be in that school, a musical instrument—piano or organ—and a lantern or moving picture machine. It also states the Department of Education are prepared to pay 40 per cent. of the equipment the first year, up to a total of $400, and for each of the three years following, 20 per cent., so that in four years the Department of Education pays your district the price of that equipment up to $1,000.

The children will also stay in school for a longer period. Instead of dropping out at 14 years of age, they will remain on until they are 16 or 17 years of age. There is also the possibility of extending the educational facilities to the whole community. Not only are you serving the boys and girls up to 18 years of age, but from time to time there are lectures which gather the whole community in. There are short courses put on at night or night schools for the people of the whole community.

Then the last advantage, and by no means the least, it promotes an enlarged play life. How could that teacher with two boys have a game of baseball unless they played catch? You cannot possibly organize play in the great majority of these rural schools, and yet those children are simply eager for it. I went into one Wentworth school last week, and while the Inspector was talking to the teacher, he said to me, "Take these boys and girls out and teach them some new games."

As to the objections that are urged: First of all, the roads are too bad. That argument has been advanced in every State and yet they have overcome it. The second one is bad weather—wintry weather,—and yet there are some schools that never missed a single waggon trip during the whole winter, and none of them have missed any more than three or four trips in the whole year.

The next objection raised is the increased cost. It is not the purpose of the Educational Department to help you to build; and it is going to cost more to carry on this school than under the old system; there may be a few cases where it may be held down to the same cost, but do not count on that. But taking into consideration the increased enrollment, increased average attendance, and everything else like that, you will find it will cost you less to give each child one day's education than under the old district system. Besides that, you are getting a better class of education, better teachers, more specialists, and you are adding to your regular course, High School work, and your boys and girls are getting their High School education right at home. Those of you who have sent your boys and girls to a neighboring town, for their High School work will know what it costs you to do that, and then count what it costs in moral training for your boys and girls, and then ask whether it is worth while to spend the extra money necessary for the better education you can get under consolidation of rural schools.

Another obstacle is tradition. A man says, "I was educated in that school; my father was educated in it before me, and what was good enough for me is good enough for my boy." Is a cradle good enough for cutting your grain? Are we content to do our work with the machinery used sixty or seventy years ago? If we are not, why should we be content to educate our children with the same machinery we had thirty or forty years ago?

Then there is prejudice. After you have used all the arguments, a man sits there and says, "It won't work,"—simply prejudice against a thing in advance of a trial, and every one of these objections has gone by the board.

The next thing is satisfaction with present conditions. We think the school section is all right, and the system is all right as it is. It is a surprising thing that in the districts where consolidation has been tried, those who had been the most vigorous opponents, after two or three years trial, become the strongest friends we have.

As to what the Department is prepared to do to help promote the consolidation of rural schools, the Consolidated Schools Act has been passed which provides for an agreement amongst the school sections. If there is any desire in a certain district to consolidate, it provides for a certain form of agreement between the four or five school sections. Full information regarding this may be secured by writing the Department of Education, Parliament Buildings, Toronto.

Not Aspirin at All without the "Bayer Cross"

The name "Bayer" on Aspirin is like Sterling on silver. It positively identifies the only genuine Aspirin,—the Aspirin prescribed by physicians for over nineteen years and now made in Canada.

Always buy an unbroken package of "Bayer Tablets of Aspirin" which contains proper directions for Colds, Headache, Toothache, Earache, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Rheumatism, Neuritis, Joint Pains, and Pain generally. Tin boxes of 12 tablets cost but a few cents. Larger "Bayer" packages.

There is only one Aspirin—"Bayer"—You must say "Bayer"

Aspirin is the trade mark (registered in Canada) of Bayer Manufacture of Mono-aceticacidester of Salicylicacid. While it is well known that Aspirin means Bayer manufacture, to assist the public against imitations, the Tablets of Bayer Company will be stamped with their general trade mark, the "Bayer Cross."

MAXWELLS LIMITED - Dept. 1, St. Marys, Ont.

Corn in Potatoes.—Peel and cut in halves lengthwise some well shaped, large potatoes of even size. Scoop out the centres, leaving a boat shaped shell about one-fourth of an inch thick. Rub them inside and out with soft butter, sprinkle with salt and pepper, and fill with fresh corn, seasoned to taste. Cover with cream sauce, and bake in a moderate oven for thirty minutes.

Green Corn Salad.—Skin round, uniform sized tomatoes, scoop out the centres, chill, and arrange on nests of crisp lettuce leaves, and fill with cooked green corn. Serve with any preferred salad dressing. Or the corn may be mixed with celery, sliced fine, placed on crisp lettuce leaves, garnished with hard cooked eggs and served with salad dressing.

Corn Custard Cakes.—Grate two ears of corn, add to them one cupful of milk, a dash of pepper, one teaspoonful each of salt and sugar, the beaten yolks of three eggs, one cupful of flour and the whites of eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Mix carefully and divide into well greased custard cups, set in a pan of hot water and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes.

Escalloped Corn and Tomatoes.—The corn and tomatoes may be either fresh or canned, according to convenience or the season. Mix two cupfuls of each, and season to taste with salt and pepper, add two teaspoonfuls of sugar, then stir in three tablespoonfuls of soft butter, turn into a greased fireproof dish, cover the top with buttered bread crumbs, and bake until well browned. Serve hot.

Corn Oysters.—Separate four eggs. Score and press out six ears of corn, add the yolks of eggs, six tablespoonfuls of flour, one teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of white pepper, and the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs. Fry by tablespoonfuls in a small quantity of hot fat in a shallow pan; drain on kitchen paper and serve hot. Another Method.—To two cupfuls of corn, add two well beaten eggs, pepper and paprika to taste, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of melted butter and enough flour to shape into small cakes. Fry in hot butter or fat or fry in smoking hot fat. Drain and serve hot.

Corn Griddle Cakes.—Put one pin of grated corn into a bowl; add two thirds cupful of flour, the beaten yolks of two eggs, one-half cupful of milk, one-half teaspoonful of salt and the whites of eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Drop by spoonfuls on to a hot greased griddle, when full of bubbles turn, and when cooked on both sides serve on a hot plate with maple syrup.

Corn Muffins.—Put two cupfuls of grated corn into a bowl, add three well beaten eggs, two cupfuls of milk, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of sugar and three cupful of flour sifted with two teaspoonful of baking powder. Mix well and divide into greased and floured muffin pans and bake in a moderate oven for thirty-five minutes.

To Dry Corn.—Score the corn down the centre of each row of grains and press out the pulp. Put this pulp in thin layer over the bottom of a baking pan. Stand it in a cool oven, with the door open, or dry it in the sun. If the oven is just right, three hours will dry it. Stir it as soon as it begins to dry. Great care must be taken or the mixture will sour before it dries. When the corn is dry, it will be in chunks.

To Cook Dried Corn.—Measure out the required amount of corn; cover it with cold milk and stand in a cool place over night. Cook in a double boiler for one and one-half hours. Add one-fourth cupful of butter and season with salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Serve hot.

To Salt Corn.—Corn may be kept for winter use by putting into a cask a layer of corn and then a layer of salt. Have a perfectly clean wooden cask. Cut the corn from the cob put in a layer of corn, one inch thick then a layer of salt one-half inch thick. From time to time add corn and salt until the cask is nearly full. Then cover with cabbage leaves or grape vine leaves. On this place a small round board, and on top of this a weight.

To Cook Salted Corn.—Measure out the required amount of corn, being sure to replace the board and weight. Wash the corn well in cold water then soak it over night in fresh cold water. Drain and cut it in a sauce pan over the fire with boiling water to cover and boil for forty minutes. Drain and serve hot with butter.

thermometer. Then add one teaspoonful of vanilla extract, three squares of grated unsweetened chocolate and one cupful of chopped nut meats. Pour into buttered pan and when cool cut into neat squares. Wrap in waxed paper and pack in boxes.

Jellied Chicken.—Singe and draw one good chicken, put it into a saucepan of boiling water and cook slowly until very tender. Lift out and set aside to cool. Cut the meat in neat pieces. Put the skin and the bones into a saucepan with four cupfuls of the liquor in which chicken was cooked, one chopped onion, one teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of white pepper, simmer until reduced to two cupfuls, then add one and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatine and allow the gelatine to dissolve, then strain. Arrange a layer of the chicken in a wet mold, then some slices of hard cooked eggs, stoned olives, and chopped parsley, then more chicken, and so on till all are used up. Fill the mold with the stock and put in the refrigerator over night. When wanted, turn out and cut in slices.

Cracker Sandwiches.—Boil two cupfuls of sugar with one cupful of water until the syrup forms a soft ball when tested in cold water, pour on to the stiffly beaten whites of two eggs, beating steadily until a meringue is formed. Flavor with vanilla, lemon or almond extract and add one cupful of chopped cocoanut. Spread between square brown crackers. Wrap in waxed paper and pack in boxes.

Molasses Cakes.—Beat one-half cupful of butter with one-half cupful of grated maple sugar, add two eggs, well beaten, one cupful of molasses, one half cupful of sour milk or cream, one-eighth teaspoonful of salt, four cupfuls of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking soda, two teaspoonfuls each of powdered ginger and mace, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered cloves and nutmeg. Mix well together, and roll out one-fourth of an inch thick, cut into rounds or fancy shapes, lay on greased baking tins, press a raisin or blanched almond in the centre of each cake, and bake in a moderately hot oven from twelve to fifteen minutes.

Stuffed Eggs.—Shell six hard-cooked eggs and cut them in halves crosswise, remove the yolks and press them through a sieve into a bowl, add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one tablespoonful of thick white sauce or cream, two tablespoonfuls of chopped cooked or canned salmon, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful each of pepper and paprika. Mix well, and fill the hollow of each egg with this mixture. Put together and wrap in waxed paper. Twist the ends of the paper. If desired, grated cheese or chopped nut meats may be used in place of the salmon.

Roast Veal and Baked Ham Sandwiches.—Slice thin roast veal and baked ham into very thin slices, season with salt, paprika, made mustard and a little lemon juice. Place between slices of buttered brown or white bread, cut into triangles and wrap in waxed paper.

A Perfect Day For The Baby Open Eyes To Baby's Needs

SECOND ARTICLE

By DR. LAURA S. M. HAMILTON

20.00

THERE is no way that you can more thoroughly alarm or anger an animal mother than by handling or pulling about her baby. She wishes it left alone, and will make the matter perfectly clear to the ignorant intruder; and if you do not respect her wishes, she will straightway take measures to hide her baby from your objectionable attentions. Would that human parents were as wise! How many of that fifty per cent. of little dead Canadian babies might now be alive, and how many of the other fifty per cent. might be enjoying a measure of vitality that can never more be theirs, because it was wasted in the useless, nay, oftentimes one grieves to say purely passionate, or wantonly careless handling of parents or others who excuse themselves by saying they "do so love to hug and kiss and play with a baby."

Animal or bird parents as rapidly as possible, yet without any real neglect teach their babies to be independent, to care for and feed themselves, to live their individual lives. In this matter also human parents will do well to take a lesson. But mark, please, I said without any real neglect. The mother who turns her baby over to an older child, or who in his bath, and is all rubbed, and smooth, and comfy and sleepy, he has another meal, and is put in his basket quite freshened up with clean, dry bedding, and carried outdoors. Here there is a beautiful spot where some leaves twinkle over his head, and the sun shines on his toes, while an old umbrella and drape of netting protects him from intruders. He will go to sleep now, perfectly comfortable and satisfied, providing the same things happen at exactly the same time every day. He is a perfect tyrant regarding time, but that cannot be altered, so must just be arranged for.

Now mother has three whole hours in which to get things "done up," and by the time he wakes for his dinner, her dinner is on cooking, and she has a few moments to sit down and feed him and get a rest before dishing it up. Then he will entertain the family while they eat, telling them in his own blessed way, about the things he dreamed of while asleep outside this morning. He will take another nap, before three o'clock when he has a lunch, and then if everything has gone right that day, will come the time he and Mother can enjoy together. She will read or sew, while he rolls about on the sends the small children unguarded on to the street to play and learn what the street affords, the while she makes pretty clothes for them, or is immersed in the everlasting and largely unnecessary housework with which most women's lives are burdened, is as surely neglecting those children as if she let them go unwashed and unfed.

I wonder how far Canadian mothers dare discard that which is only traditional and conventional in favor of what is healthful and truly beautiful.

THE following is a simple schedule of Baby's day as it should be:— He wakes about 6 a.m., and gets his first feeding. If he has a short nightgown, and a little pad underneath him, there will not be much to change; so that can be done very quickly, and a little comfy wrap open down the front, slipped on, and he is laid down, or if he is old enough, allowed to sit up with the pillows around him, on Mother's bed while she is dressing. Or if she is in a daylight-saving place, she will be already dressed when Baby, basket and all, can accompany her wherever she is working.

By 8.30 he may have had another nap, and we hope Mother will have been able to get through with breakfast, etc., so that she can bathe him. He will be ready for his next meal by that time or nine. Somewhere in the interval between, she may have given him that nice teaspoonful of strained orange juice that he so much enjoys. When he has had a lovely time grass, or on a big, old quilt on the floor, or perhaps she will put him in a carriage or little cart and visit some of her friends. She will not let them take him out or jump or maul him. She loves him too much for that. This mother has a big love, bigger than pride or personal vanity, or love of appearance, or fear of criticism. It is a very big love indeed. It stretches from a long time before Baby was born to a long time after she herself has gone to be with God. And somewhere up in Heaven the ends of the love will meet, and Baby and Mother will be safe inside the circle.

About five o'clock Master Baby is getting tired. Mother has really tried to keep him awake the last couple of hours, but now she undresses him and rubs him and lets him kick and play on her lap, or wherever it is warm and pleasant without any clothes to bother him at all. This is just a lovely time. Perhaps Daddy comes in now, and everyone is very happy for a few minutes. Then after his hands and face and legs have been bathed, Baby has a whole fresh set of clothing put on for the night. He is fed at six o'clock, and is tucked up in his basket, and not even the Prince of Wales himself, should he elect to visit Mother, must be allowed to disturb him now. He may be put outdoors again if the evening be clear and there is a sheltered, quiet spot for him. He can stay outdoors too, till Mother's bedtime. She will feed him again between nine and ten, and change him if necessary, and see that his toes are quite warm, and then everyone will go to bed and to sleep for a whole blessed night.

The Hoover lifts the rug from the floor, like this—flutters it upon a cushion of air, gently "beats" out its embedded grit, and so prolongs its life

The perennial beauty of a valuable rug is the reward of frequent and thorough cleaning. Such cleaning is easy to perform with The Hoover because it beats... as it sweeps, as it suction cleans. All injurious embedded grit is fluttered out by gentle beating. All stubborn litter is detached by swift sweeping. All loose dirt is withdrawn by strong suction. Only The Hoover combines these three essential operations. And it is the largest selling electric cleaner in the world.

Just About Ourselves

By THE EDITOR

FOR the first month of autumn we have decided to take a day off and talk to you about the JOURNAL and what you may do for us. A journalistic authority has written for us the appeal on this page, and we hope you will read every word of "Wanted—A Wider Vision" and decide to attain that broad Canadianism which will make you interested in what your countrymen and countrywomen are writing.

Then, we should like to say a few words to would-be contributors who are anxious to send us pictures, poems and stories—to say nothing of articles on the High Cost of Living. We are willing to consider all such contributions, but please send a stamped and addressed envelope with your article or story. This seems a small request, but it is a highly important one. When many manuscripts are received in the course of a month, the cost of postage for those which must wend a homeward way is considerable. The experienced writer does not resent a rejection of poem or story. He or she takes it as part of the day's work, regards it as business and sends the returned manuscript out on another journey which may prove highly successful. Instead of a returning manuscript, one of your fairy ships may sail in, laden with a cheque which will gladden your heart for twenty-four hours. It is well to study the nature of each magazine before sending your cherished production to the editorial authorities.

WE told you last month of two artists who have done excellent work for us in cover designs, and we know that you will enjoy this month's September girl by Miss Kerr. In October there will be an autumnal cover by Miss Long, and for November a new contributor, Miss Yvonne McKague, has given us a delightfully quaint and picturesque design. So you can see that the newcomer is welcome and that we are willing and even eager to discover new talent. However, we must admit that when we receive sketches and paintings intended for illustrations or covers, and frankly admitted by the senders to be the work of those who have had little or no training, we wonder just what estimate the would-be contributor has made of what is needed.

We should like all Women's Institute members to bear in mind our photograph competition for sampler or quilt, and send in their competing manuscripts with picture accompaniment by November 1st. The competition should bring to light many treasures of sampler or quilt, and everyone knows that these articles, dear to our foremothers, are highly popular to-day.

Stories are insisted upon in the modern journal, and we are giving you the work of some of our best writers in East and West. Next month we hope to publish another contribution by Beatrice Redpath, who is showing her versatility by writing most unusual stories, whereas a few years ago we first made her acquaintance as a poet of distinct charm.

WHEREVER you go and whatever you do in these days, you hear about health and clinics and better days for all of us—from the baby to the great-grandmother. We are pleased to announce that in October a new department will appear, "Health and the Home," the writer of which is a physician of national reputation, whose skill and counsel will be shown not only in monthly articles, but in answers to correspondents who are in need of a word of friendly and efficient advice. We feel that we have been most fortunate in securing a trained and sympathetic writer for such a department, whose professional wisdom is matched by her unflinching sympathy. The interests of the baby will not for a moment be neglected, but the topic of health will be treated in the broadest way, for it means the weal of "Home and Country."

This is the month when the boys and girls go back to school, and the school-yards, which seemed so forlorn and desolate during July and August, suddenly brighten as the lively young pupils crowd them at recess and make the neighborhood echo with the exercise of Young Canada's lungs. Perhaps you have noticed that during the summer we have had two pages of school announcements which have shown the variety of our educational institutions, to suit the demands of any household. The universal testimony is that never were our students—in primary, secondary or university circles—more eager for the work that lies ahead in the school year; and here are best wishes for the Canadians at school!

Wanted—A Wider Vision

"We do gaze each through our knot-hole, and do dream broad heaven is but the spot we see." So wrote a great thinker many years ago. He spoke a great truth, for men in all ages have been inclined to circumscribe their thinking within very narrow bounds. To the Romans, Gaul was the Ultima Thule, the last land, the uttermost horizon. To the average Roman, indeed, the "Ultima Thule" was probably confined within the walls of Rome itself.

With the passing years, the few wide thinkers, the few great adventurers, have pushed our horizons back, given us an opportunity to see a greater field. But with it all we are still inclined to gaze through the knot-hole, that shows us our little community, our individual interests, our few friends and our limited enthusiasms, and still we dream that broad heaven is this place we see.

All well enough in its way, well enough to have our local prides and appreciations, but it is not that way that nations are made. We have the grain grower in the West thinking one thing and the manufacturer in the East another. And the men by the sea in the East will have nothing to do with the men by the sea in the West. We have at times a bitterness engendered by race, creed, and language, hints of dis-union, breaths of a wind of misunderstanding and distrust, a thousand varying viewpoints, the viewpoint of the knot-hole of the district, and little enough to draw us together.

What we need is a wider vision, that we may discard our knot-hole viewpoint, and look out on the broad sky that domes the whole country. We want a vision that can take in the interests of the Western prairies, and the interest of the habitant farms of the East, that will put an end to the bickerings between one section and another of the country. We want to see things from the standpoint of the nation, not from the standpoint of a town or county.

It is for this reason that a National Press is so essential for Canada. There is an actual need for national magazines that can cover the country from coast to coast, that can foster no local prejudice, but by their nature can bring to the country, as a whole, knowledge of how men in this part of the country and that, are living, that can tell of their hopes and aspirations and ideals. So it is possible to discount the points of divergence, and make strong the common bonds. They are the prophets of the larger vision that means so much to Canada. They are the only factor that can make for lasting peace and unity, the only factor that can build a national spirit on the basis of a sympathetic understanding. And that, because the national magazines are the only medium that can touch the people everywhere. Yes, the national magazines are the soundest insurance against disruption, the strongest assurance of a common ideal of nationhood, that exists to-day. They are the medium through which Canadians can find their wider horizon.

Your complexion tells a story to the world

HOW fearlessly, how confidently, the girl with a fresh, soft, lovely skin meets the eyes of the world! Nothing to conceal! For almost always a clear, radiant complexion is an indication of a buoyant, well-poised nature, healthful living and fastidious habits.

Nothing so quickly creates an impression of your personality as your skin. By keeping it soft, clear, radiant—you can make it speak instantly, unmistakably of fastidious freshness and charm, of dainty care.

Don't let your skin tell a story of neglect—of unhygienic or thoughtless habits. Even if through the wrong kind of treatment your complexion has lost the smoothness and freshness it should have—if it has become pale and sallow—spoiled by blemishes or disfiguring little blackheads—you can give it back the color and clearness that make other girls' complexions so attractive.

For your skin is constantly changing—it changes every day, in spite of you. Each day old skin dies and new skin takes its place. And you will find that this new skin, if given the care its particular need demands, will respond instantly and gratifyingly.

The most embarrassing flaw— how to overcome it

Perhaps you suffer from that embarrassing fault of so many complexions—an oily skin, and a nose that will get shiny.

A certain amount of oil in your skin is necessary to keep it smooth and supple.

This oil is constantly being produced by the glands of the skin. When it is too abundant, the result is an oily skin and shiny nose. To correct this excessive oiliness use this special treatment:

Every night with warm water work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap in your hands. Apply it to your face and rub it into the pores thoroughly—always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with warm water, then with cold—the colder the better. If possible, rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

The very first time you use this treatment, you will notice that it leaves your skin with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. This means that your skin is responding, as it should, to a more thorough and stimulating kind of cleansing than it has been accustomed to. After a few treatments, the drawn sensation will disappear, and your skin will emerge from its nightly bath so soft and glowing that you will realize the good this treatment is doing your skin. Use it regularly every night, and see what an improvement it gradually makes in your appearance—how much firmer and drier your skin becomes under this care.

Special treatments for every type of skin

This is only one of the famous Woodbury treatments for improving the skin. Get the booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap and see for yourself how carefully each different skin need has been studied. You will find here the treatment for blemishes—for blackheads—for conspicuous nose pores—for each of the commoner skin troubles. Find the treatment for your individual type of skin and use it regularly and faithfully.

Woodbury's Facial Soap is sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada. The booklet of treatments is wrapped around each cake. Get a cake to-day—begin your treatment to-night. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, and for general cleansing use.

"Your treatment for one week"

Send 25 cents for a dainty miniature set of Woodbury's skin preparations containing your complete Woodbury treatment for one week.

You will find, first the little booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," telling you the special treatment your skin needs; then a trial-size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap—enough for seven nights of any treatment; a sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream; and samples of Woodbury's Cold Cream and Facial Powder, with directions telling you just how they should be used. Write to-day for this special new Woodbury outfit. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 5209 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

IT was with much trepidation that Canada watched the coming and going of the first 'Varsity girls. They were talked about, written about and most gravely considered. Dire prophecies were made as to the influence they would exert in the community. Under the malign leading of a degree, lovely woman would forget all about the affairs of the household and man would go dinnerless and uncared for. The magazines took up the subject and the 'Varsity girl made many an anxious editor splutter inky questions concerning her possible loss of domestic tendency. But for more than a score of years she has been going her learned way in Canada, and we no longer hear or read discussions of whether she should be allowed. She came, she studied, she took her degree. She married, and her husband is no more afflicted with indigestion than is the man who wooed and won the degreeless lady. So, the 'Varsity girl no longer causes a flutter and a questioning. She is part of our modern life, and is accepted as a rather desirable feature of the life of to-day.

Not long after she began to lend variety to the college walks, there arose a foolish cry concerning the "new" woman. Now, Solomon assured us long ago that there is no new thing under the sun, and certainly Solomon should have known something about feminine vagaries. Woman is not going to become new, even if she chooses to add a mortar-board to her array of headgear. She is the same perplexing and interesting creature as she was when Eve took to the study of botany and found that it was not on the regular curriculum. The 'Varsity girl is essentially a woman, and is not going to turn the world upside down or inside out. She finds her fancy turning lightly to spring hats, as well as to May "exams," and she by no means despises the American Beauty rose or the seductive chocolate cream.

WHEN woman entered upon university study there was a foolish and enthusiastic sisterhood that stood back and declared, "Now, just watch them! They'll take everything from the men." But the 'Varsity girl has done nothing of the kind. She has held her own—consisting of the course in modern languages. Occasionally she strays into the paths of Greek or chemistry. But the classical or scientific girl is rare, while the "moderns" department has come to be regarded as exceedingly ladylike. It would be interesting to know how many teachers of English, French and German in secondary schools are 'Varsity girls. Even in a college course woman seems to have found a peculiarly congenial sphere. High honors have not been wanting to the 'Varsity girl, but there has been no display of such marvelous industry and erudition as to alarm her brother student and her worthy professor. The head of the 'Varsity girl is to be respected. But, after all, it has not yet been proved that in matters intellectual man is but a poor and incompetent creature. In remote districts, the girl who goes to 'Varsity is yet considered an unusually brilliant and intellectual being—a dangerous ornament to her sex. But in college towns she is not necessarily so esteemed. We do not expect her to kindle the waters of the Great Lakes, but we do expect her to acquit herself with credit and to of 1920 takes her learning lightly and knows that the world does not expect her to discuss Schopenhauer and Hegel. She gives herself no airs of superior wisdom, but her influence is felt, for all that, wheresoever women are gathered. There is a broader and less personal tone in our women's societies and clubs. The "sins of emptiness, gossip and spite and slander" are not dead, but the 'Varsity girl is one of the forces that will hit them hard. After all, it is just as interesting to discuss the foibles of Shelley and the love letters of the Brownings as the affairs of our neighbor—and it will not hurt Shelley or the Brownings.

FEARFUL and wonderful tales were told of the manner in which the 'Varsity girl would array herself. It was told that she would draw her hair straight back from a prominent brow until her eyebrows would rise perforce. She would wear blue goggles, and would have no respect unto ruffles and chiffon. In fact, she would be a frump of the frumpiest order. But the prophecy has not been fulfilled, and the 'Varsity girl goes her dainty way, with her hair as fashionably puffed or waved, her collars as bewilderingly beaded and ribboned as her sisters who know not of Latin. She lends to the gown a certain grace that it had not known when it hung from straight, masculine shoulders, nor does she take from its dignity. She has learned that the gymnasium is not to be despised, and that a good figure is as much to be desired as first-class honors in French prose. When she betakes herself to a dance, she wears as fluffy and foolish a gown as any debutante could wish for, and she does not bore her partners with 'Varsity shop. In truth, cap and gown have found no enmity to "gowns."

Of course, the 'Varsity girl has an eminently modern way of regarding man. She does not regard him as a being to be marvelled at or adored—because she has found out that a university course is not an uneasy matter and that a woman also may learn a few things about metaphysics and political economy. She looks upon him in a friendly, companionable fashion, and treats him accordingly. The 'Varsity man, it is whispered, regards her as a necessary evil and wishes that she would betake herself to Vassar or Bryn Mawr. But, until some kind dignitary begs a successor of Carnegie to give us a women's university, the youths put up with the 'Varsity girl and are far from unkind. There is a formidable array of women in our university classes, and he is a brave man who would say that their absence would fill a long-felt want. They have shown that they are sufficient unto themselves by the many organizations that have been formed. They are an abiding and independent community. One change has been noticed in recent years. Formerly, every 'Varsity girl was looking to a position in high school, college, or possibly in journalism. But now a great many of the girls have no thought of a "career," but are simply taking the work because they feel that it is part of life's equipment. It is a bitter experience to desire a university training and be denied. After all, it is better to give a girl her own way even if it leads to an Arts degree.

exhibit only a very few "stars." She is not an intellectual prig, and does not take herself too seriously. The 'Varsity girl of early days was inevitably too important and solemn concerning her place and opportunities. She was fully aware of her experimental nature, and was on her guard against frivolity and trifling. But our 'Varsity girl

To publish as far as possible, and reproduce the work of Canadians that our readers may become familiar with their own people, their own literature and their own country with its wonderful possibilities and glorious history.

How to keep your nails fashionably manicured

This season's fashions are built to display the hands

B RILLIANT fans to permit a graceful motion of a perfect hand. Sleeveless gowns that lead the eye down the slender arm to rest on the finger tips. Beads with which pink finger tips may toy. These and a dozen other pretty fancies this season are especially designed to display the hand.

Never before have hands been so conspicuous. Never before have women given so much thought to their care.

The chief beauty of the hands is the nails. The cuticle must be slender, even, firm. If possible, each nail should show a pretty half-moon at its base. It is unpardonable this year not to have perfectly kept nails and cuticle.

It is easy to have lovely nails

An easy, quick, safe way has been discovered for manicuring your nails! A way which thousands of women are using regularly.

With fifteen or twenty minutes given regularly each week to this simple, scientific method of caring for your nails, you can keep them always exquisite.

There is no need for the time-taking soaking of your nails, for the slow and ruinous cutting of the cuticle. Learn to manicure the new, easy way! The safe way!

What cutting does to the cuticle

Cutting the cuticle leaves a ragged, irregular edge. The more you cut it, the more rapidly the cuticle grows—the tougher and more uneven it becomes. Dust grinds into these little irregularities, as it could never do if the cuticle were smooth and even.

For years there was no way of getting rid of the surplus cuticle except cutting it. But after long study an expert perfected the formula for Cutex, the safe cuticle remover. Now you can rid yourself of the superfluous cuticle without any disfiguring hacking at your fingers.

How to give yourself a perfect manicure

First, file your nails to the desired length and shape. Smooth away any roughness with the emery board—one comes in the Introductory Set.

Now wrap a bit of cotton around the end of an orange stick (you will find both in the Cutex package), and dip it into the Cutex bottle. Then work it gently around the base of your nail until the cuticle is softened. Wash your hands, and as you dry them, push the cuticle back.

For snowy-white nail tips, squeeze a little Nail White under them—directly from its convenient tube. It removes all stains and discolorations. Finish with a quick shine with Cutex Nail Polish. For a more brilliant polish, use the Cutex Paste Polish, then the Cake Polish. For an unusually quick, brilliant lustre use the Cutex Liquid Polish.

Do you notice that your skin is drier at one season of the year than another? This is apt to happen particularly in cold weather, or if your hands are in water a great deal. If you wish to keep the cuticle particularly soft and pliable so that you do not need to manicure as often, apply Cutex Cold Cream at night on retiring.

Give yourself this Cutex manicure regularly once or twice a week according to the rapidity with which your nails grow. You will be free forever from the embarrassment of unsightly nails. You can enjoy the grace of lovely hands.

So many busy women are keeping their nails in wonderful condition with Cutex, that ill kept ones are no longer excused. They are considered as evidence of personal carelessness.

Try Cutex today. You will be delighted to find how much beauty it gives to your hand.

Cutex is on sale at drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at all chemists' shops in England. Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream are 35 cents. The Cuticle Remover comes also in 70-cent bottles.

Six manicures for 20 cents

Mail the coupon below with 20 cents and we will send you the Cutex Introductory Manicure Set containing small sizes of Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Cake Polish, Pink Paste Polish, together with orange stick and emery boards. Enough of each to give you at least six manicures. Send for it today. Address Northam Warren, Dept. 1108, 200 Mountain St., Montreal.

CHAPTER NINE.

THE BANKER AMAZES TWO GIRLS.

MOLLIE AIKEN had triumphed at last. Since that memorable Sunday morning in Stanley Park, Mollie and her friend Bessie Ingraham had had many clashes over the Cupid Exchange matrimonial scheme. Sometimes Bessie had weakened, often she had stubbornly resisted Mollie's suggestions. More than once, superhuman tact and diplomacy alone had prevented a final break.

But by dint of holding before Miss Ingraham a dazzling future as a cattle baron's wife, by repeatedly lauding Mr. Harrigan's noble character and manly virtues—as related by his secretary, F. H., in one of his many letters—by drawing comparisons between the Harrigan wealth and the Ingraham penury, and more particularly by repeated dissertations on the Harrigan home, its splendid furniture, and rare mural decorations, Mollie had at last obtained a favorable answer.

"But," warned the bride-to-be, "everything's got to be just as they say it is, or it's all off. And you'll have to come up with me."

"Me! Why?" questioned Mollie.

"Do you suppose I'm going to be married in a strange place, to a strange man, and not have at least a bridesmaid to stand by me?"

"But, honey, think of the distance," protested Mollie.

"You'll be coming back, won't you? If it's too far for you to travel for a holiday, maybe it's too far for me to go and live there," argued Bessie.

So Mollie had consented to make the journey to Harrigan's ranch with her friend. Bessie had left the Nectar Palace, and had plunged into the engrossing task of preparing her trousseau. She was considerably in the dark as to what clothes to buy for her future duties as mistress of an eleven-hundred-and-twenty-acre ranch, not including leases, and even the Cupid Exchange had not been able to settle the difficulty. Cory Harrigan had been appealed to for advice, and the answer had been not to bother with clothes at all; Mr. Harrigan had an account at the principal store in Soda Creek, where the young lady could outfit herself after she reached the country and could secure the assistance of resident ladies who were much more competent than Mr. Harrigan, per F. H., in such delicate matters.

Bessie had been very dubious about the style of goods she could buy in Soda Creek, but had performed to accept the inevitable.

"Besides, honey," consoled Mollie, "don't forget that Mr. Harrigan has an account at that store in Soda Creek, and you can charge everything you buy," an argument which carried great weight.

And so it came about that the two girls left Vancouver on a morning train, bound for Ashcroft. They had bought the tickets with their own money, but that was to be practically the sole expense of the trip. The Cupid Exchange had pointed out, in one of its last letters to Mr. Harrigan, that the journey to Soda Creek was a long and presumably expensive trip, and that it was usual for a bridegroom to make the necessary provision for such outlay. This was the first time the question of money had been hinted at in the correspondence. But if Mollie expected a cheque she was disappointed.

Instead, Mr. Harrigan's scribe explained that Mr. Harrigan's banker at Ashcroft, on being given the enclosed letter, would be pleased to give the lady any assistance she required, and would also relieve her of the necessity of attending to the details of the journey.

At Ashcroft the two young women called on the banker and presented the letter. It read:—

"Please engage car to Soda Creek for this young lady, and give driver money to meet all road expenses, charging same to my account. Cornelius Harrigan."

"Which young lady is it?" inquired the banker blandly.

"I'm the one," answered Bessie, blushing slightly, and expecting the usual compliments.

But the banker, who knew nothing of Harrigan's country, merely surmised that he was possibly a school trustee, and this young lady a new teacher. He chatted pleasantly for a few minutes, then volunteered to introduce the girls to the hotel manager, under whose care he would leave them till morning.

"And I'd advise retiring early, Miss Ingraham," he said, "the auto will call for you at five o'clock."

"Oh, my goodness. I'll have to finish my sleep in the car, then," exclaimed Mollie.

"You're going part of the way with your friend, are you?" inquired the banker.

"All the way," answered Mollie.

"Mr. Harrigan only mentions one lady," commented the banker, referring to the letter. "And," looking at Bessie, "I understand you were going up to replace the old one."

"The old one!" chorused the two girls.

"Well, let's say the previous one, then," said the banker, with the air of one making an unimportant concession. "I never saw her, to my knowledge, so she may possibly have been quite young. I don't want to discourage you, but it does seem hard to keep the same lady for any length of time up there."

Mollie and Bessie exchanged surprised glances. Then, determined to know the worst, Mollie asked:

"Does Mr. Harrigan change often?"

"I'm sure I don't know," was the answer, "in those unorganized districts it's sometimes hard for one woman to please three or four men."

"Please three or four men!" echoed Miss Ingraham in amazement.

"Is that all she has to do?" Mollie asked sarcastically.

"And look after the children, of course," the banker smiled. "you'll probably find from ten to twenty youngsters to welcome you. If I remember right, nine is the least the government allow."

"Nine! But doesn't the old one take her children with her when she goes away?" required Bessie in amazement.

The banker looked extremely puzzled at the question.

"Why, no, of course not. Whatever would she do with all those youngsters?"

"How long did Mr. Harrigan and his associates keep the old one?" required Mollie, anxious to learn as much as possible about the extraordinary happenings of the past.

"Now I come to think of it, I don't just see went up three or four years ago. You I remember her now. She was quite young, too. About eighteen, I should say."

"And," Bessie went on, gasping and incredulous, "you mean to tell me she had nine children!"

The banker explained patiently. "Not exactly that. I said the government insists on nine, but quite likely she had more. You'll probably have twenty if you stay there a few years. The population—Why, what's the matter—Hey, water, quick...."

For Bessie had threatened to faint.

Mollie staggered towards her, and collapsed. And the banker, who had a weak heart, just crumpled up.

CHAPTER TEN.

ON THE OLD CARIBOO ROAD.

VERY early next morning the two girls started from Ashcroft for Soda Creek in a powerful Cadillac piloted by Tony Dalzell. The bank manager had done everything in his power to atone for the misunderstanding which had led to the general collapse in his office. He had not only procured the most comfortable automobile plying for hire on the Cariboo road, and a careful driver, but he had even exceeded the letter of his instructions and provided ample funds for the comfort of the bride-to-be and her bridesmaid, once he had learned the true state of affairs. And he had been gallant enough to rise at half-past four o'clock on a chilly morning and walk down to the hotel to bid the ladies bon voyage. Of course he had gone back to bed later on; the bank did not open until ten o'clock.

"Remember, ladies," he had said, "you don't have to bother about anything at all until you reach Soda Creek. The chauffeur will look after everything for you. Mr. Harrigan will no doubt have some friends to meet you at your destination, if for any reason he cannot be there himself. He knows when to expect you?"

"We told him what day we'd leave Vancouver," answered Mollie.

"That will be all right, then," said the banker. "Once again I wish you much happiness, Miss Ingraham, and an enjoyable journey to you both. Good-bye."

The banker stood in the middle of the road waving his hat, a solitary figure shivering in the morning chilliness, until the car curved out of sight and sped through Ashcroft's Chinatown. Then it crossed the bridge over the Thompson River and in a few seconds was taking the Ashcroft hill on intermediate gear.

With the easy familiarity of the professional chauffeur, Tony Dalzell leaned back in his seat and opened conversation with his fares.

"If you're finding it at all chilly, ladies, I'll put up the top for you any time you say. No? All right, then. Lots of folks find it pretty cold being up so early in the morning, but it's as you say. You can't see the scenery with the top up. If there's anything you'd like to know, ladies, just ask me. I'm on this road all the time, and as full of information as a guide on a New York rubber-neck wagon."

"And just about as fresh," commented Mollie, sotto voce.

But the chauffeur was at least refreshingly fresh, and in a surprisingly short time he had his passengers keenly interested in his stories and descriptions. He drove slowly past the Cache Creek rancherie, waved a greeting to the solitary Indian in sight, and pointed out the home of Blind Jimmy, the Indian freighter who could hold his own against the white men engaged in the same business.

The girls were disappointed at the appearance of the Indian village. As Miss Ingraham expressed it: "It looks too civilized, too prim; a nice little church, substantial houses and stables, but not a tent or tepee, and not a single, starving cur yapping at our heels. It's not like any Indian village I ever read of."

Once, when the two girls broke out in admiration of an orchard filled with ripe apples, Tony stopped the car, vaulted over the fence and returned with a cap filled with luscious fruit.

"Oh, thank you so much," said Bessie. "I haven't eaten an apple for ever so long. Aren't they lovely?"

Munching greedily, Mollie managed to mumble: "Young man, you shouldn't steal like that."

Tony grinned: "What's wrong with my way of stealing? I got away with it, didn't I? And I had to get these now, because we'll be out of the fruit belt as soon as we pass the Twenty."

"The Twenty what?" asked Mollie.

"The Twenty Mile House," explained Tony. "The road houses are numbered according to their distance from Ashcroft or Lillooet. Instead of having names like 'The Princess Hotel,' they're known as the Twelve Mile House, the Twenty, the Fifty-Nine, the Seventy, and so on. For that log building over on the left? That's

The Little Woman

TO declare that a little man is at a disadvantage is to be overwhelmed with "Look at the Japs" and "Think of Bobs and Napoleon and—". There follows a list of the world's great little men, which almost persuades one that the lack of inches is the root of all achievement. In spite of statistics, however, it remains a fact that a little man is extraordinarily sensitive about his brevity, while he is fortunate if he does not assume a pompous air in order to impress the world with the truth of worthy Dr. Watts' remark, "The mind's the stature of the man." Little men have succeeded where many a sluggish giant has failed ignobly; but the tall man is yet the "eternally fit" specimen, whether we turn to the tailor's model or to the hero of the woman novelist. The artist who would depict a small and scrubby "Adam" as an ideal of physical manhood would speedily be made aware of his mistake.

But when we consider lovely woman, matters are different indeed. It is true that Tennyson wrote about a woman who was "A daughter of the gods, divinely tall."

While such an overwhelming person might be very much at home among the demi-gods, she would assuredly be unappreciated among the sons of men. It is the small person who is both delightful and dangerous. In the days of her childhood she places her tiny red shoes upon the neck of a doting father, who can play the part of stern "governor" to the boys, but who is as wax in the hands of his small daughter. She is so frail and dainty that it would be a matter of cruelty to refuse her anything, and so she has her own way from infancy to old-ladyhood, and, by some wonderful process of inward discipline, she escapes being spoiled.

The novelist and his comrade-in-falsehood, the poet, have been fond of referring to woman's tears as if they were eminently becoming to the feminine countenance. As a matter of fact, there is nothing, except, perhaps, the polo hat, which is so trying to the features as what the flowery writer terms "a passion of sobs." The average woman in a fit of weeps is distinctly unpleasing, both to sight and hearing, for not only her eyes, nose and mouth are weirdly exercised, but there are chokings and gurglings which are far from being soothing or melodious. But the little woman has reduced weeping to a fine art, and is so pathetic and yet winsome a figure when giving way to grief that her tears are even more dangerous than her smiles. They are so formidable a weapon, indeed, that she resorts to them only when all others have proved ineffective.

As a rule, the little woman is amiable, even to other and larger women. But when she is otherwise, she becomes so sweetly venomous that her sisters rise up and call her "a perfect cat." She is never openly and frankly hostile, but makes the most maddening remarks with an air of childish innocence that completely deceives a man and makes him wonder what she has said or done to make the other women "so awfully down on the poor little thing." She is the one who remarks on the very trying shade of brown you are wearing, and quietly makes you uncomfortable for an hour by concluding, "I didn't know that you ever wore that shade. It requires such a perfect complexion to carry it off well." She is always so commiserating and sympathetic that one is forced to fume in silence, lest the little woman should wonder what she has said to offend, in the language, "I really didn't dream of annoying you. But then, I believe in 'perfect' sincerity."

The perverted proverb which came out of California—"a little widow is a dangerous thing"—is practically and profoundly true. The most acute form that the little woman can take is the widow. She was bewitching in the pink muslin frock of childhood; she was a vision of girlish loveliness in her bridal gown of white Duchesse when she "came in on her father's arm"; but as a pensive widow with the daintiest white edge to her bonnet, and a frightened, appealing expression in her eyes, she is a sight to make Saint Anthony drop the prefix to his name and devote himself to consoling this extremely forlorn creature. She seems to need frequent and persistent consolation, for she is so utterly unfitted to battle with the world. Her grief is a sacred thing at first, but after a time the would-be comforter ventures to tell her that she is too frail and sensitive to be alone, that she needs to be protected, and that he is an enthusiastic believer in the policy of protection. So the little widow ceases to refer to "poor dear John," pensively puts his photograph away, and when the world beholds her in a fetching costume of heliotrope and silver grey it smiles knowingly, for it knows there will soon be a quiet wedding, on account, as a thoughtless reporter once expressed it, "of a recent bereavement in the bride's family."

the first school established on the mainland of British Columbia, soon after the gold rush. One of the first scholars is now a judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

"He is!" said Bessie with admiration. "I wonder how famous he would have become if he could have been educated in one of our modern Vancouver schools, instead of in that woodpile."

"Whatever is the matter with that roof?" interjected Mollie, half rising in her seat in her amazement at the appearance of a building some distance away.

"My goodness!" exclaimed Bessie, in tones of great surprise.

Tony looked puzzled: "There's nothing the matter with it, is there? It doesn't seem to be caving in."

"But what's on top of it? A garden?" inquired Mollie.

"Oh, I get you now," laughed the chauffeur. "That's a new one on you, eh? That's a mud roof."

"A what?"

"A mud roof, a dirt roof, a roof made of earth. Of course you can't keep grass and weeds from growing on soil. Looks funny when you're not used to it, but you'll see lots of them before we get to Soda Creek."

"But why don't people use shingles, or slates, or something?" Mollie wanted to know. "That building needs a hair cut."

"Costs too much to bring in shingles. Very often they put shakes over the dirt roof, but they also need the soil to keep the houses warm. There's about two feet of dirt over the poles on that roof."

"I don't like it. I don't like it," repeated Bessie. "That house looks as if it were making faces at me. I hope I don't have—"

"You'll be quite used to it by to-night," consoled the chauffeur. "And now we'll put on a little juice and get to Clinton and breakfast."

They came in sight of the town of Clinton suddenly and it seemed to the passengers as if the car would glide through the little burgh before Tony could get it stopped. But he brought it to a standstill at the Ladies' Entrance of the hotel, jumped out, and opened the door of the tonneau.

Miss Ingraham stood up and surveyed Clinton. "Gracious," she said disapprovingly, "I never knew a town could be so thin."

"I feel just like Clinton, then. Let's go and eat a big breakfast," urged Mollie.

The long ride in the bracing morning air had given the two girls a keen appetite, and they did full justice to the fare spread out for them. Tony nonchalantly took his seat at their table, and freely gave unsolicited advice regarding the dishes they should order.

"Some of these road houses," he explained, "can spoil every kind of food, others only spoil certain kinds. It's taken me quite a while to learn how to eat on the Cariboo road, and even now I'm stumped every time a Chinese cook gets fired."

After breakfast the two ladies declined a facetious invitation to be taken for a drive around town and shown the points of interest, which Tony described as the culvert, the hitching post, and the government stables.

"Now that it's getting warmer you want to watch out for the mosquitoes," laughed Tony, as he fussed with the steering gear. "You girls better put on your veils."

Inasmuch as his broad back seemed innocent of any intentionally undue familiarity, the "girls" decided to follow his suggestion without comment.

CHAPTER ELEVEN.

THE CHASM—AND A SURPRISE

THE car sped along gracefully, taking the long Clinton hill easily. Neither of the girls had done much motoring, but they were beginning to realize that this road was unusually good for a country road. They said so to the chauffeur.

"Oh, we haven't started on the Cariboo road yet," he assured them. "We won't be halfway when we get to Soda Creek, and it's as good as this, every foot of the way, or pretty nearly so, anyway. It ought to be a good road; they've been fixing it for over fifty years now."

The car sped along, mile after mile. Once in a while they whizzed past lumbering freight wagons, Tony and the teamsters exchanging flying greetings.

At the Fifty-Nine Mile House Tony stopped to "give her a drink." As he was getting the water from a flume a man sauntered out from the hotel and chatted with him for a few moments. The conversation seemed to interest the chauffeur very much.

Once on the road again, Tony turned to his fares with mock severity:

"You might have let me know, girls. I call it real mean of you, there now."

"Let you know what?" came a puzzled duo.

Instead of answering, Tony frowned comically and whistled a few bars of a popular tune. He was still whistling merrily when something grey, pattering furtively in the light timber close to the road caught his eye.

Jamming on the brakes, he dived under the seat brought out a rifle and with a shout of "Stand still," fired twice. Then he took a flying leap out of the car and returned in a minute with his victim.

"Isn't that a dandy?" He held up the animal by the bushy tail, five feet of silver grey fur that looked half wolf, half dog.

"What is it?" asked Mollie.

"A coyote. The worst enemy the cattle men have in this country. It kills hundreds of sheep and calves every year, and is so wary it's almost impossible to trap it. But it always stands still when one hollers out. I made a good shot that last time."

"What are you going to do with it?" Bessie wanted to know.

"Collect the bounty. The government pays three dollars for every coyote killed. If it was later in the year the hide might be worth five dollars, but now it's not worth anything. Not enough fur."

And Tony rattled on, telling stories of trapping and hunting in the wilderness, how men went alone in the solitudes for months at a time, and came out in the spring with their store of skins and pelts. Sometimes they made big money, some years they earned a mere pittance. But they went back year after year, the foremost runners in the endless march of civilization.

Shortly after, when rounding a curve, Tony slowed up and brought the car to a standstill at the edge of the road. The passengers were reclining lazily in the tonneau.

"What is it?" asked Mollie, languidly.

Tony leaned out and looked to the right.

"There seems to be a hole in the ground here," he remarked, as one who has just discovered something quite new. "But," he added, "don't be afraid. The car is on solid rock."

Mollie and Bessie half rose in their seats to satisfy their curiosity. Then gave vent to a cry in which fright was hardly suppressed by amazement. They were standing on the brink of an abyss.

The two girls gazed spellbound at the mighty cleft in the earth. The chasm extended as far as the eye could reach, like the trail of a monstrous python writhing in agony. The walls were precipitous, sheer in places. Here a jutting ledge miraculously supported a stunted pine tree, seemingly hanging, like Mahomet's coffin, between Heaven and Earth. There a crevice, looking a mere scratch in the precipice, was partly hidden by a clump of scrub willow. Great patches of red-berried kanick-kanick dotted the walls, like splotches of blood issuing from a gaping wound. Near the top, where the sun could penetrate, the sombreness of the rocks was relieved by dashes of color, the vivid brown and yellow of the tiger lily, the flaming vermillion of the painter's brush, the golden dots that were marigolds and wild sunflowers, and the creeping rusty red of the withered wild strawberry leaves.

Lower down, the color scheme shaded to the blue and brown of the rock and soil, with great blue and green blankets of moss and ferns in the moist places. Below, the coloring became vague and indefinite.

An air of utter desolation seemed to pervade the depths of the canyon. Shapes and outlines were hardly distinguishable in the gloom. Far down in the murk one could guess the presence of a moving thread of water, but no splash or ripple broke the solemn stillness.

A sense of human insignificance impressed itself on the onlookers. They were in the presence of the evidence of some mighty cataclysm of nature, some fearful upheaval of an age long past and long forgotten. What it was, and when, or why, no man can tell. No known natural manifestation of energy, such as an earthquake, or glacier, or spontaneous combustion, or volcano, could inflict such a gash on the face of nature. Yet there it was, frightful, awe-inspiring, mysterious, the Chasm.

"Drive on, please," said Mollie, at last, very quietly. "This is awful. It's like standing on the brink of the grave of God."

Tony nodded and drove on.

On the brow of a hill they passed half a dozen freighters, the men grouped around one wagon while the horses rested. As the car sped by the teamsters waved their hands and shouted a boisterous greeting.

"They know something," Tony chuckled.

Evidently they were not the only ones who "knew something." Half a dozen men on horseback drew aside when the car approached and saluted the ladies with exaggerated politeness and smiling faces.

At Seventy Mile House an old shoe was tossed on Miss Ingraham's lap as they passed a cheering group.

"What are they throwing rubbish like that at us for?" asked that indignant lady.

Tony chuckled again: "They know something."

Mollie had picked up the shoe. It was old and battered. Suddenly she understood. An old shoe. Of course it had only one meaning.

She giggled as she handed the relic to her friend.

"It's for you, dear."

Miss Ingraham saw a great light. "Do you mean to say those people know?" Her startled tone bespoke her incredulity. Yet there was the worn old shoe.

Tony smiled broadly as he answered:

"Sure they know, Miss Ingraham. Everybody on the Cariboo road knows by this time. And to think you never told me," he ended reproachfully.

"And did those teamsters know? And those men on horseback, with the funny leather pants? How can they know? Not a soul up here knows me."

"They know you're the good-looking girl in the blue dress, coming up with the good-looking girl in the grey dress, in Tony's car. As to how they know, there's a telephone line and a telegraph wire running into every road house. And you gone there'll be another pair waiting for you at the next place. Better grin and bear it, Miss Ingraham, we only get married once in a long while. Believe me, you're getting off easy."

What Tony did not know was that the hoydenism at the road houses was merely a prelude to the reception planned for the bride-to-be when Soda Creek was reached.

The news that Harrigan was going to be married, and that the bride was coming up the road in Tony's car, had created considerable excitement when it flashed over the wire from Ashcroft, and was relayed from roadhouse to roadhouse. But when the story reached Soda Creek, where Cory's matrimonial scheme was a matter of common knowledge, it created a sensation. That the bride was young and passing fair only made the romance of greater interest. The town decided to have a real old-time wild west celebration in honor of the event.

It would meet the auto and escort it into town with a band.

It would charivari the hotel.

It would hold an all-night dance at Soda Hall.

It would have a Harrigan night.

All day Soda Creek made preparations for the evening. Bulletins of the car's progress were posted in the hotel window. Soda Creek knew every time Tony's passengers were cheered or pelted with rice; it knew how many old boots were hanging on the rear axle; it howled with glee when it heard that an address of congratulation had been presented to Miss Ingraham at the Hundred and Thirty.

By two o'clock, every boy was whistling "Harrigan, That's Me."

An hour later the big bridal cake, to be cut by the bride at the dance, was on exhibition in the baker's window.

The town scenic artist painted a large banner, "Welcome The Bride." It was stretched across the main street, where two winsome little girls were to present the ladies with beautiful bouquets—already on exhibition in the Emporium window. Soda Creek certainly intended to surpass itself.

CHAPTER XII

BESSIE CUTS THE BRIDE CAKE.

FIVE miles outside Soda Creek a team of spirited bays hitched to a light democrat were trotting easily along the road. Presently a grey auto hove in sight. The democrat took up the middle of the road and waited.

As the car slowed down the driver held up a hand and signalled the chauffeur to stop, then beckoned him to her. She was a pleasant-faced buxom woman of possibly thirty-five, and she spoke as one accustomed to direct and order.

"Tony," she said, as that young man came up to her, "they tell me you're bringing her up for Cory Harrigan, and a bridesmaid."

"That's right," assented Tony, "and believe me, if Harrigan backs out—"

"Harrigan's likely to back out, isn't he?" broke in the lady, "But quite seriously now, Tony, what kind of girls are these?"

"They're awful nice girls, both of them. That's Miss Ingraham in the blue dress, Mrs. Harrigan-to-be, maybe. The other is Miss Aiken."

"Been jollying them all along the road, eh?"

"Honestly, I haven't. They're not that sort. I got just a little bit fresh once or twice—you know me, I can't help it—and the temperature dropped to sixty below right away."

"How'd they take the congratulations along the road, Tony?"

"They got tired of it pretty soon. I've been putting on the juice at the last places, when I saw they'd had enough of it. They're city girls, and not used to this rough stuff."

The woman in the democrat nodded. "Just as I thought. I didn't drive here out of curiosity. They've been fixing it up at Soda Creek to put those girls through the mill. They're coming out to meet you with the band, they're going to give them a charivari and drag them to a dance to-night, and a lot more stuff. At least that's what they aim to do."

"And you came out to put a crimp in it?"

"Tony returned . . . with his cap filled with luscious fruit."

see everybody knows Cory Harrigan, so that makes them even more interested."

"To think," said Bessie weakly as she sank back into the cushions, "to think I've been pitying these people for being so isolated!"

Tony was not exaggerating when he said everybody on the Cariboo road "knew something." At every road-house groups would cheer and wave hats or handkerchiefs, according to sex. Once Tony swung the car close to a building and rice showered on the girls from an upper window.

At the Hundred and Fifteenth, where they stopped for dinner, a wedding march was played on the piano during the meal. And when, back in the car, the fares waited patiently while Tony refilled his gasoline tank, a hidden but vigorous chorus brought more blushes to Bessie's cheeks:

"H-A double R-I-G-A-N spells Harrigan, That's Me."

to which a deep bass added:

"Not Yet. But Soon."

And then, while Tony twiddled a wrench over a perfectly solid nut on his engine, the chorus varied occasionally, but returned invariably to the orthographic rendering of "Harrigan," and the booming assurance that it was "Not Yet, But Soon."

As the car finally slipped away, a thumping noise gave warning that something was being dragged behind the auto. Tony grinned when his attention was called to it.

"Old boots, I guess," he said.

"Oh, please stop and throw them away. I don't want to be tagged like this. It's too ridiculous."

"Aw, what's the use?" smiled Tony. "They've already telephoned ahead, and if the boots are

Scenes of Picturesque Charm and Religious Association in a Land Where Tourists from All Countries Have Found Delight in the Beauty of Lakes and Mountains and the Historic Significance of Shrine and Chapel

By MARIE WIDMER

Picturesque Wildkirchli, near Appenzell.

ALIVING temple of God with altars towering high into the heavens and with a veritable labyrinth of exquisite side chapels of rare individual beauty, such is Switzerland, Creation's masterpiece. For could mere man ever conceive a nobler and more uplifting altar than God has created unto Himself; those glorious mountains, pointing heavenward, silent reminders of eternity in their statuesque beauty of flawless marble and overwhelmingly lovely in their occasional periods of transfiguration—at dawn and at sunset, when their serene brows shine in a halo of rose and gold and when the very doors of heaven seem to have been thrown open.

To live in a land where the Creator has manifested Himself so forcibly can have but one effect upon a normally receptive mind—almost unconsciously it is filled with a reverent feeling for nature. It is therefore not surprising that historians and writers have frequently dwelled upon the fact that the natives of Switzerland possess very deep religious convictions and that they display a simple, childlike faith in matters which they consider as ordained by Heaven.

Christianity has had its beginning in Switzerland in the early centuries of the Christian era when places of worship sprang up in the settlements of the valleys and on the lakes, on the hill-tops of the mountain districts and even on the difficult Alpine roads.

Whether it be but a humble wayside shrine, or a diminutive chapel clinging to the steep mountainside: whether it be one of those quaint old village churches whose stained glass windows would be the envy of many of our modern churches, or one of those glorious cathedrals—architectural masterpieces of the Middle Age—dotted here and there we find them in great numbers in Switzerland, an everlasting object of pious devotion and admiration on the part of the natives.

In Eastern Switzerland, near Appenzell, in an interesting and extensive region of caves, which is noted for prehistoric finds, stands the picturesque retreat of the Wildkirchli, whose founder, a priest from Appenzell, erected here in the year 1656 a little hermitage with chapel for himself. In the year 1679 he willed the Wildkirchli to the state of Innerrhoden, specifying that it should remain a hermitage forever. Some 16 hermits lived consecutively in this mountainous solitude until 1851, when the hermit's dwelling was abandoned as such and transformed into a commodious inn, in order to accommodate the great number of pilgrims and tourists who yearly flock to the hermit's chapel of St. Michael. A memorial tablet in the vicinity also reminds of the poet Victor von Scheffel, author of "Ekkhard," who completed this well known novel up here in the year 1854.

Another picturesque city is Lucerne, a place of proverbial loveliness, nestled on the mountain-enclosed, fair lake of the Four Forest Cantons—now generally known as "The Lake of Lucerne." In very early days, when mountains, glaciers and torrents were regarded with feelings of awe rather than of admiration, a little group of fishermen's huts stood on the banks of the Reuss. The first event of importance in the history of this settlement was the founding of the Benedictine Monastery of St. Leodegar about the year 735 and the ancient church of St. Leodegar is consequently Lucerne's foremost place of worship.

Only the two seventy-five metre high Gothic towers remain of the original edifice which was devastated by a fire in the year 1633. The church, as it stands now, is a masterpiece of German Renaissance. The distinguished splendor of the interior, with its woodcarvings, its frescoes and statues shows that only the very best products of art and artisanship of mediaeval days have been used here for decorative purposes. Lovers of music will also be delighted with the wonderful organ of the church, an instrument with 4,950 pipes and a wonderful and unique "vox humana" and a "vox celesta."

Other interesting places of worship are the 17th century Church of St. Xavier with eight chapels and several excellent altar-pieces and the pure Gothic, 14th century Franciscan Church, with a handsome Renaissance chapel, artistically carved choir stalls and copies of the banners captured by facade in the early Renaissance style. Connoisseurs hail it as the finest specimen of its kind in that part of Europe and artists describe it as a symphony in marble.

IN central Switzerland, too, in a sunlit Alpine valley, where the majestic Titlis, King of the mountains of Unterwalden (Obwalden), stands eternal guard, lies Engelberg, the mount of angels of former days, a gloriously beautiful spot, whose existence is also closely connected with an ecclesiastical foundation. For history tells us that this by nature so lavishly endowed valley was uninhabited by man until the beginning of the 12th century, when Baron Conrad von Seldenburg came from the canton of Zurich to the valley, seeking a spot on which to establish a religious place of retirement from the world. When he reached the neighborhood in which Engelberg now lies he heard distinctly several times from the mountain the song of angels. To the pious man this was a sign from heaven, that he was to build here the convent which he had planned. Thus arose in 1120 A.D. the monastery of the Mons Angelorum, or Mount of Angels—Engelberg!

The history of the Benedictine abbey is rich in bright and gloomy leaves. Even the pious founder experienced the hardness of fate. As he was undertaking a journey to his home in the interests of the monastery in 1126, he was assassinated. While the pioneer brothers had to concentrate their efforts upon making the land cultivable, the members of the monastery already displayed an inclination for the acquirement of knowledge some twenty years later. This resulted in the founding of the library of the abbey.

The monastery became a prey of the flames three times, in 1199, 1303 and 1729, and plague, war and famine caused great distress in the first half of the 14th century, especially in the nunnery which had grown up beside the monastery. The nunnery was finally transferred to Sarnen on the Brunig route, where it still enjoys great esteem and the monastery, with its fine school, which remained in Engelberg, devoted itself successfully, under the guidance of eminent abbots, to the pursuit of literature and science, and poetry and drama were cultivated as well as theology and history. In order to assist the inhabitants to a steady source of income, the abbots also introduced the silk-weaving industry in Engelberg.

The Convent building itself occupies considerable space at the end of the village. It is not generally open to the public, but men of learning are occasionally permitted to visit its spacious, solemn halls, its guest room, with a portrait gallery of the abbots who have helped to shape the destiny of the foundation, and the simple but comfortable cells, with their high, bright windows, where the monks indulge undisturbed in their love of learning.

An exceptionally rich library and large collections of coins, objects of natural history, parchments and products of ancient artistic work have become a noteworthy feature of the monastery.

A brief survey of the extensive administrative and farming departments of the abbey suffices to indicate that the Monastery of Engelberg is not only a centre of religious devotion and science, but also a model agricultural enterprise.

In the same canton of Unterwalden (Obwalden), near the lovely lake of Sarnen, on the Brunig route, lies the village of Sachseln, with its beautiful Parish church containing the remains of Niklaus von red Flue, who was one of Switzerland's most venerated heroes.

THE FEAST OF "OUR DEAR LADY OF THE SNOW"

This photograph shows a pilgrimage of the pious village folk of Zermatt to the tiny chapel, "Maria zum Schnee," on the Schwarzsee, Switzerland. Weather permitting, Mass is read here on Sundays during Summer. The Feast of "Our Dear Lady of the Snow" is celebrated here yearly on August 5th, and natives as well as visitors flock in great numbers to attend the service.

the Swiss in their glorious battles for freedom. This latter edifice seems to particularly emphasize the strong desire felt by the Christians of the Middle Ages to express themselves through new architectural styles.

The world famous Kapellbrücke and the Kapell-square owe their name to the St. Peter's chapel, a modest structure of curious design which existed already before 1178 and used to serve as a meeting place for the community. Five paintings by Paul Deschwanden decorate this simple, impressively solemn chapel.

Lugano, which also traces its origin far back into the Roman period, has often been described as a miniature Naples. Its curving line of quays sweeps around a gulf of pure azure; white houses sun themselves in amphitheatre and a wreath of villas is thrown out upon the countryside. The interior of the town is quaintly arcaded and paved in large blocks, Italian fashion, and the numerous time-honored churches contain some of the rarest masterpieces of art.

Barnardino Luini has left some of his best works upon the walls of S. Maria degli Angeli, a "Passion" in three sections, a "Last Supper" and a widely known Madonna. Luini was especially a painter of frescoes and in this capacity he had no rival for the brilliancy and unity of his colors. The Cathedral of San Lorenzo, which was erected by Tommaso Rodari at the end of the 15th century, occupies a prominent position on a hill and has a costly marble Lucerne, looking towards the graceful heights of the Rigi.

"Brother Claus," as he was called in his later life, was born here in the year 1117 and up to 1467 he lived as a prosperous farmer among his people and served them with his wise counsel and his sword. However, he was constantly filled with an ardent desire to devote his life entirely to God and with the permission of his wife he finally left his family in his fiftieth year and built himself a hermitage on the nearby Raut, where he spent his days in prayer and pious meditations.

But he did not shut himself off from humanity; on the contrary, he always had a ready ear and comforting word for all those who confided to him their troubles. Brother Claus was also intimately conversant with the actual conditions of his country. It was consequently no fault that the pastor of Stans appealed when the disputes of the cantons assembled in that place, and when, after endless, heated debates the two parties had drifted so far apart that a civil war was threatening. Brother Claus responded to the call and the matters which could not be settled after an argument of three days were now finally and amicably disposed of within an hour.

Niklaus von der Flue died in the year 1487 and was buried in the church. His resting place in the church at Sachseln and the hermitage and chapel at Fluch Raut have ever since been visited by a great many pilgrims.

ANOTHER Alpine district with a historic religious past is the Urseren Valley, on the St. Gothard road, a peaceful, verdant stretch of land watered by the Reuss and surrounded by lofty mountains. The natives of Urseren were converted to Christianity in the beginning of the 7th century by the Irish monks Columbanus and Sigisbertus.

Andermatt, the chief village of the Urseren district, has three interesting places of worship—the very ancient, several times reconstructed St. Columban church, the 17th century village church, built in the Italian rococo style, and the 18th century chapel Marienhilf, with a valuable painting of Christ on the Mount of Olives.

A little higher up, at the junction of the St. Gothard and Furka Passes, lies Hospental, considered to have been the first settlement in the Urseren Valley. It owes its name to the designation of Hospitum, an inn, probably erected in the Roman era for the convenience of travellers from the Valais to the Gothard and Rhaetian districts. The church of Hospental, built between 1705-1711, stands on the lower terrace of a rocky promontory and is one of the attractions of the village; on the top of this hill looms a weather-beaten, solitary tower—the only remains of the former castle of the Barons of Hospental.

On the summit of the St. Gothard road itself, which takes a southern turn at Hospental, stood in the early days a similar Hospice, or inn, with a little church, probably a foundation of the Benedictine Abbey of Disentis, which in its turn was called into existence by the before mentioned Irish monk Sigisbertus. St. Gothard, Bishop of Hildesheim, canonized in 1132, was made Patron Saint of the Hospice.

Near the spot where the Limmat leaves the lake of Zurich, there stood in very ancient prehistoric times, a village of lake dwellings, the homestead of probably the oldest settlers in the country. The Lindenhof and the Uetliberg—the latter still showing the ruins of the "Refugium" ramparts, are said to have been chosen for their first colonies on terra firma. On the mound of the Lindenhof, the Helvetians erected the first fortress of "Turicum", which in the year 58 B.C., after the battle of Biberakte, fell under the power of the Romans. When the Romans withdrew their legions, the Alemanni became masters of the country and the Roman Turicum became Alemannic Zurich. Under the dominion of the German kings and emperors the town acquired importance through the monasteries and chapter of the Fraumunster and Grossmunster, the latter of which is said to have been founded by Charlemagne and the former, in 853, by Louis the German, who appointed his daughter Hildegard as Lady Abbess.

Zurich's most famous place of worship is undoubtedly the Grossmunster, erected in the Romanesque style with the upper stories of the towers completed later in the Gothic style. On the west tower is enthroned Charlemagne with gilded crown and sword in recognition of his donations to the church. The interior contains pillars with Romanesque capitals and three large modern stained-glass windows decorate the choir. The early 13th century cloisters have been restored and are well worthy of a careful visit.

The Grossmunster is moreover famous for its intimate connection with the great Swiss Reformer Zwingli who, for a period of twelve years, beginning with New Year's Day 1519, was in charge of this church. A monument is erected to his memory at the Chancel end of the former Wasserkirche lying opposite. This particular edifice contains now the most interesting Municipal library.

In an effort to explain the foundation of the Wasserkirche, a legend relates that once, when Charlemagne came to the city, he had a pillar set up before his palace with a bell and some attached thereto, and made it known that whoever suffered wrong should pull the bell when the Emperor sat at dinner, and he would come out and settle the story of his wrongs.

One day the bell rang and the Emperor, going out, saw a serpent which nodded its head and started for the lake, turning around to see that the Emperor followed. There the latter saw that a toad was sitting on the eggs of the serpent, and immediately declared that the toad should be burnt to death. The next day, as the Emperor was sitting at table, to the terror and astonishment of all present, a serpent crawled through a hole in the wall, swung itself down, lifted the cover of a goblet on the table, dropped a precious stone therein, and departed the way it had come. The Emperor in his joy founded a church on the spot where the serpent's nest had been, a church which to this day is known as the Wasserkirche (water church).

Zurich, which has often been described as an intellectual paradise, possesses a veritable wealth of interesting churches. Aside of the above-mentioned Grossmunster and Fraumunster, there is the ancient St. Peter's church—in which John Caspar Lavater officiated for 23 years as pastor—and the very modern Neumunster; the church of our dear Lady (Liebfrauenkirche), the church of the Holy Cross (Kreuzkirche) and the church of St. Anthony (St. Anton's Kirche) are stately Roman Catholic places of worship and the furthermore existing English and French churches serve as an indication of the cosmopolitan character of the city.

NORTH of Zurich, near the Falls of the Rhine, lies Schaffhausen, a mediaeval gem of rare charm, often described as the town of oriels, for there is scarcely one old house which has not an architectural ornament of this kind.

The principal place of worship in this city is the Munster, now the Protestant Parish church, a classic structure in the early Romanesque style, dating from the beginning of the 12th century. Although the exterior is plain, the tower pleases the eye by its beautiful proportions and ornamental coloring. The interior also, a flat-roofed basilica with three naves makes a powerful impression upon the beholder, on account of its stately proportions and noble peacefulness. The church is a monument of the most flourishing period of the monastery of All Saints, the buildings of which adjoin it to the north and west. This convent was founded by Count Eberhard V and consecrated in 1052 by Pope Leo IX in person.

The celebrated Munster bell, cast in 1486, whose motto: "Vivos Voco, mortuos plango, fulgura frango," inspired Schiller to write his immortal "Song of the Bell," has had to relinquish its duties some years ago, in consequence of a crack, and now reposes as the "Schiller Bell" on a granite pedestal amid appropriate surroundings between the cloisters and the chapel of St. Anne, at the southern foot of the tower from which for centuries it called the living to devotion, tolled for the dead on their last journey and broke the power of the thunder-bolt.

Not far distant from the Wildkirchli is St. Gall, the famous embroidery seat of modern days and one of the most influential centres of Christian civilization in central Europe. The city owes its foundation to the Irish apostle Gallus who, in the year 614, founded a hermitage near the brook Steinach. In the resulting monastery of St. Gall, the strict rules of the Irish Church were enforced until 720, when those of St. Benedict were substituted by an abbot, Othmar. In 1061, the Abbot Norpert of St. Gall erected a convent on the Sitter River, the place taking the name of Abbatis Cella-Appenzell, and the abbots of St. Gall became the dominating influence in the land, until the subsequently much oppressed mountaineers resorted to force and succeeded in shaking off their yoke.

Before the Romans conquered the territory now known as Switzerland, it was inhabited by a conglomeration of hostile tribes, for the most part of Celtic origin. But the district of the eastern Alps in which the present canton of the Grisons is situated was in possession of the Raeti, of mixed Latin and Etruscan stock. At the time of the Teutonic invasion of the Roman Empire, Rhaetia received a number of German-speaking immigrants and in the tenth century was used for a while as a basis of operations by the Saracen brigands who made Europe unsafe.

The Grisons, Switzerland's largest canton, may readily be described as an Alpine wonderland. It is broken up by no fewer than 150 valleys, varying greatly in size, traversed by wild rushing torrents and streams and animated by roaring waterfalls and transparent mountain lakes. Dark green fir-woods and velvety pastures cover the slopes and form the transition from the region of the hills to the realm of the high Alps. And in this radiant paradise of vales and mountains there stands almost on every height a little place of worship, an emblem of peace and good will, sending greetings far and wide.

One of the most venerable spots in the entire region is Chur or Coire, the Capital of the Canton, which traces its foundation back to the Roman era, when it was generally known as Curia Rhaetorum. What is known as the Episcopal court occupies high ground. Here the Cathedral of St. Lucius and the bishop's palace face upon a square, adorned with a fountain, the entire quarter being surrounded with walls, so that its general appearance is quite like a fortress. The bishopric is first mentioned in the acts of a Synod of Milan, in 452, but there is the legend of a missionary, a certain Saint Lucius, from Britain, who is supposed to have established himself here at an earlier time.

The Cathedral of St. Lucius, named after the traditional first bishop of Coire, was begun in the 12th century and consecrated in 1282. It is the successor of older churches, dating possibly as far back as the 4th century. The general character of the building is Gothic, though the Romanesque feeling still lingers in many of the details. The influence of antique and Italian models is closely discernible in the ornamentation and sculpture, as for example in the figures of the Apostles on the columns of the outer portals, which are both supported and surmounted by lions.

The interior is remarkably beautiful in every detail and art critics declare that the 15th century High Altar, for instance, a masterpiece in carved wood, painted and gilded, is one of the finest examples of its kind in existence. The Virgin, supported by SS. Emerita, Lucius, Ursula and Florian, occupies the centre, while on the wings are SS. Gallus and Othmar, SS. Sigisbert and Placidus. The exterior shows the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi; below are six scenes from the Passion and on the canopy appear the Annunciation, the Coronation of the Virgin, the Trinity, Prophets, Apostles and the Last Judgment. At the back is the Crucifixion.

From Chur we may follow the course of the river Plessur to the sunny heights of Arosa, whose picturesque village church never fails to inspire visiting poets, or we may explore the romantic home of the Rabiosa, the district of Churwalden and Lenzerheide. The venerable church in the former village is used by both Catholics and Protestants and the still existing, weather-beaten monastery building, a foundation of the St. Lucius Bishopric of Coire, is now the residence of the Catholic priest.

VIA the lovely Pratigau, the vale of meadows, watered by the Landquart, we gradually climb by train to the higher situated villages of the Grisons, which adorn the extensive net of the Rhaetian Railway, like an endless string of matchless pearls. # THE CHASM

By BLANCHE GERTRUDE ROBBINS

ILLUSTRATED BY MARION LONG

PETER CRANSTON came down the stairway with all the dignity of the master of the home; entered the dining room precisely; stooped over Phoebe's chair, kissed her gravely and seating himself in the opposite chair proceeded with breakfast in the perfunctory manner, habitual to the methodical, seasoned bachelor.

Phoebe's cheeks flushed. She had not yet accustomed herself to Peter coming down the stairs to breakfast with her. Three months as the wife of Peter had forced upon her a realization, that she was sharing life now and forever with Peter. But the breakfast hour threw them both into a strangely self-conscious mood. Peter always lunched in town and the dinner was generally free of embarrassment because of the guests who dined with them.

Peter opened the morning paper and scanned the headlines, reading fragments between grape fruit and bacon. Phoebe, her sedate, matronly figure presiding with dignity over the coffee urn and the cups, listened to the bits of news, mumbled out by Peter. She must heed these items, that interested the man and read assiduously, that she might draw Peter out of his shell. Eighteen years ago, when they had pledged their troth, Phoebe had had little need to study methods of interesting Peter. Peter had asked, alone, that she honor him with her presence. Naturally she had changed in those eighteen years. The freshness of youth and her girlish vivacity were gone, but she had supposed that Peter had loved her for herself—not her girlish attractiveness. Her hair had whitened prematurely, lending softness and dignity to her serious face.

Suddenly Peter's hand sought his watch and as he glanced at it, his gray eyes narrowed into a frown. With haste, his massive, erect figure pushed back the chair and he rose from the table, folding the paper hurriedly.

"A run this morning to make the suburban, Phoebe. Good bye, don't get lonely. You know you must not find married life dull," Peter admonished with a dry, little laugh, stooping over Phoebe's chair to administer the second perfunctory caress.

Phoebe rose from her chair impulsively, following Peter to the door of the dining room; then reluctantly turning aside to the sweeping window, that looked out onto the street. Standing there, she watched Peter cross the street briskly and board the suburban car.

And this was married life! This was the sort of existence, for which Peter had so heroically waited eighteen years. It was so little different from the bachelor life of Peter in his suite, that for years he had called home. Was not Peter's wait worthy of great, throbbing happiness?

"Oh, Peter, Peter, have I lost your love?" she cried out bitterly.

But she knew that Peter would have laughed to scorn the implication of her cry. He would have assured her that his love was undying. But the Peter, who kissed Phoebe, his bride, was a very different Peter, who had so passionately demonstrated his declaration of love eighteen years before.

Phoebe gasped with the significance of it and repeated, tragically, "eighteen years!"

They were in the early twenties, when they had fallen in love—Phoebe, the girl artist, on the threshold of her career and Peter, venturing into business, that promised success. Phoebe had pleaded for a career—laid before him her ambitions. They had loomed so big—bigger even than Peter's love. Of that she was assured while the career stretched before her, elusive, tantalizing. And Peter, unselfish, big-hearted Peter, who desired more than all else to make Phoebe happy, had agreed to wait until her ambition had been satisfied. "Loaned her to her beloved art," he had explained huskily.

WHILE Peter had gone on working with perseverance, courting the success, that had made possible this splendidly appointed home, Phoebe had had her fling, triumphed in her little circle of art, won distinction with her canvases. Then one day—scarcely six months ago—Phoebe had suddenly felt old and tired and lonely, with a great yearning for Peter. She had written to Peter, crept back to him and he had opened his arms to her, giving only the privilege of taking care of her.

Peter was showering upon her the best of all, that had come to him. But Phoebe might be Peter's cousin, sharing his home, for all the difference in his attitude toward her. Between them yawned a chasm—a mysterious, unbridged chasm, terrifying to Phoebe. Was it only the wait of those years? Was it the mere fact, that during all these years, each had lived their own self-centred lives?

Phoebe shut her eyes and thought madly, intensely. Peter was just as dear and big-hearted and chivalrous, though so mature and matter of fact. Phoebe from her pinnacle of art could laugh with sheer gladness. The triumph had been well worth the struggle. And was not this home worth the wait?

Phoebe moved restlessly from room to room, then paused deliberately in the massive, faultlessly-furnished library. Suppose they had married eighteen years before and started a home in an obscure, little flat? How slow would have been their rise to this height of affluence? There would doubtless have been children with their accidents and their illnesses to hinder progress. Phoebe choked back a sob. Never would the perfection of these rooms be disturbed by her children. There would be no childish mischief or childish fingers to mar the beautiful furnishings; no baby's feet to patter over the glossy floors or baby laughter to waken the silence of the beautiful home. All through those eighteen years of self-centred living, she had not harbored these thoughts. And its startling realization aroused her with tragic forcefulness.

She had kept Peter—the best man in all the world—waiting; deprived his life of the worthwhile things. She had triumphed in art. Her pictures were very precious to her. They were the children of her genius. Peter had exhibited pride in her pictures. But what did they count for actually in Peter's heart of hearts?

Suppose those five canvases that had won distinction, had been children, belonging to Phoebe and Peter? The woman's soul contracted suddenly with pain. If their children had lived and gained the prominence of those pictures in the world, Peter's pride would have been intense.

The telephone bell tinkled and as Phoebe lifted the receiver, she responded, recognizing the voice of one of her neighbors.

"No, Mrs. Dawson, I am not painting a great deal these days. Peter waited so long, that I feel I owe it to him just to make the home—yes, my maids are competent and I have leisure moments—"

"A baby?" Phoebe's voice choked. "A little home mission baby coming, out on the prairies, and nothing ready. Oh, the poor, poor little mother! Mrs. Dawson, can't I come around and talk it over? Why, I would love to help."

Phoebe hung up the receiver with a forceful, little click, her cheeks crimson, her heart thumping with excitement. Her artist's mind had instantly grasped the picture—the prairie shack, where the home mission pastor and his brave, little wife had struggled in their work; the cruel accident, a result of a terrific blizzard, which had culminated in the sacrifice of the pastor's life and the crippling of the wife. For many weeks the little mother-to-be had lain helpless on her bed. There was no tiny layette prepared and the mother heart was agonized with disappointment. Her appeal had reached the women of Phoebe Cranston's neighborhood. Hearts would doubtless open generously; but Phoebe hungered to be the first to answer that appeal.

Three hours later Phoebe slipped her key into the lock of her home, balancing a great, grotesquely shaped bundle under her left arm. The department store had urged that she permit them to despatch it by special delivery; but the impatience of the woman insisted upon carrying it home, that she might immediately begin her new work.

"Anna," she called excitedly to the maid. "Did you ever cut out baby clothes? Look at all the beautiful things, that I have bought for a little prairie baby. Will you help me?"

"Sure, Mrs. Cranston, I've put many a stitch into my sister's babies' outfits," responded Anna, opening the bundles curiously as Phoebe threw off hat and coat. "Bless me, but ain't the little feller goin' to have things swell."

"They will be dainty," responded Phoebe. "Oh, Anna, you do think the babe will be a boy, don't you? Mrs. Dawson was planning to ask the whole neighborhood of women to help; but I persuaded her to let me do it all—every blessed bit—alone. I'd like to see that little, prairie mother's eyes snap, when she opens our box of baby's things."

AT six o'clock Peter came sedately up the front steps and into the hall. At the door of the library he paused, gasping with incredulity, his long, lean face puckered into frowns.

"Oh, Peter, it is never six o'clock. I—I quite forgot dinner," wailed Phoebe, scrambling from the floor, littered with flannellette and paper patterns. "And you will have to telephone the Vincys that we—I have another engagement to-night."

"But, Phoebe, what—whatever?" Peter choked out his query, his eyes focused on the little white barrowcoat stretched out on the massive, walnut table.

"It is for the prairie baby, Peter. The little mother is crippled and helpless and worried to death because she has nothing ready," half sobbed Phoebe, adding in a whisper, "we just can't disappoint her, can we, Peter?"

Peter screwed his fine, Roman nose in perplexity. This strange, tumultuous greeting on the part of his sedate wife was most disquieting and confusing.

"I—I am afraid I don't quite understand," he muttered.

For a brief moment Phoebe hesitated, confronted by an insane desire to thrust Peter's dignified figure down into the depths of the big chair, throw herself into his arms with all the impulsiveness of youth's love as she would have done eighteen years before, and pour into Peter's ears the story. But those eighteen years of self-centred living stretched a mighty gulf between them and Phoebe stood by the walnut table, with all the sedateness of forty odd years and told in detail the story of the prairie mother-to-be.

For a few moments the man stood silent, challenged by the woman's enthusiasm. Mechanically his big hand fumbled the roll of downy, white flannel, then brusquely he turned, stammering out his approval of Phoebe's undertaking.

"Very—very good, Phoebe, if it isn't too big a task for you. You must not over-do—ought to prove a God-send for the mother. Was that the dinner gong?"

Phoebe ran hastily up to her room to bathe her hot cheeks and slip into a fresh dress. She had so feared to arouse Peter's interest. But how could she expect to interest a man of Peter's bachelor years in babies and layettes, when Peter, himself, would never father a baby.

The time for completing the wardrobe was alarmingly short and Phoebe setting herself to the task, locked the door of her studio, cancelled all social engagements. It was as though she was working her lost motherhood—the lost opportunities of those eighteen years of waiting—into the layette. With the fashioning of every tiny garment, her soul was flooded with a strange tenderness, like unto nothing she had ever before known. Gradually Peter learned to come home at night to find the library turned into a sewing room and ceased to exhibit embarrassment. But his interest in the wardrobe was painfully desultory. And when Phoebe shook out the little white dresses and laid them on Peter's knee, he praised the handiwork—the stitches, that never saw a machine—rather than the garments themselves.

Once when Phoebe spread a tiny, knitted jacket of blue over Peter's new sheet and explained, "Peter, it is blue, Little Boy Blue, he is sure to be a Boy Blue," she saw Peter wince as though she had cruelly hurt him. Her own eyes blurred and she withdrew the little blue jacket in confusion. How had her words so stung Peter? Had he ever dreamed of a Little Boy Blue in those eighteen years of waiting?

It was a Summer's midnight—cool and fragrant and silent—when the finishing touch had been put upon the tiny wardrobe. Peter had been kept late at his club in town. With a strange restlessness Phoebe went through the assortment of baby things, thoughtfully, lovingly adding here a stitch, there a ribbon or the pressure of the electric iron. To-morrow the box must be shipped to the waiting mother on the prairie. To-night—the wardrobe complete covered the library table. She would leave it like that to show Peter. Perhaps its very completeness would awaken his interest.

PHOEBE dropped down into the chair, that faced the library table, opened the drawer and hunted out paper and pen. What message should she send with the baby wardrobe? For a moment she hesitated, then wrote swiftly, madly. It was as though her heart reached out and met the heart of the little prairie mother. A great wave of longing swept her soul. Hers alone, had been the joy of making preparation for the baby, and now her joy was ended.

Phoebe Cranston poured out her heart, burdened with the fierceness of hunger, that was shaking it these days, when it was too late to appease the hunger. She told the prairie mother of those eighteen years, that she had kept big-hearted Peter waiting so cruelly—something she had not admitted to herself. Midnight struck and Phoebe hurriedly folded the written sheets. Peter's key turned in the latch of the door and Phoebe, tremulous, her eyes burning with unshed tears, sprang from her chair to greet the man.

"What, Phoebe, waiting for me?" he questioned with surprise.

"I wanted to show you all the baby things. See, they are finished," Phoebe explained turning to the walnut table and lifting lovingly the garments one by one.

Peter came slowly to the side of the table—his sluggish movement that of the middle-aged. But his interest was not lacking to-night. With a curious breathlessness, that was apparent, he watched his wife's fingers open up each baby garment, irresistible in its purity and daintiness. In silence he inspected the bassinette—the ivory toilet things and the dozen and one added comforts. The woman laid the baby blue blanket with its charm of bunny-rabbits on the table, then withdrawing her hands, clasped them tensely.

"They go to the prairie mother to-morrow," she announced simply, the tragic finality of her tone matching the hunger cry of her soul.

Peter turned abruptly raising his eyes and keenly studying the whiteness of her hair. Phoebe met those piercing eyes and her heart leaped in rebellion. What was that, which she read in Peter's eyes? Was it pity? Oh, God, it was pity for her—Phoebe. With all the pathos of his soul, he was looking strangely up at her. Once his glance wavered and fell upon the baby things, then back again to Phoebe with glaring, maddening pity, wounding deeper than any biting sarcasm. The pathos of the tragedy had struck deep—the pathetic joy of the woman, who had made ready the layette—the motherhood denied to Phoebe because of her years.

With a sharp cry she fell to folding the tiny garments, her cheeks white, her eyes blazing, talking at random, confusedly of the box, that must be shipped on the morrow. Peter moved toward the fireplace, lighting his pipe and smoking moodily.

"Nearly one o'clock, Phoebe, you had better finish in the morning," he urged kindly. And Phoebe turned from the library, following Peter's lead into the hall, conscious of the chasm yawning—unbridged between them.

Phoebe Cranston had been watching Peter make his suburban car the morning that the letter came from the prairies. Eagerly she opened and read the message written by the prairie mother the day that Phoebe's box had reached her.

"Dear Woman of the Hungry Heart:—

"I have laughed and sung and cried over every blessed wee garment and kissed the tiny stitches. And I have crooned lullabies over the sweet, downy things. I can never make you understand what your love and your generosity in making ready for my prairie babe stirs within me. I only wish that sometime his head will cuddle up close to your heart and he will croon his own child. She fell asleep with her baby—a sturdy, prairie boy—at her breast. A neighbor woman has taken the child and the box, which you made ready, into her home. She has six of her own, but there is always room for one more in a prairie home, I'll warrant you never can guess the happiness your box brought to the poor, crippled mother in her hour of stress.

"Yours,
"ROBERT BLANE, M.D."

Phoebe Cranston dropped trembling into the chair, her heart beating with suffocation. Again and again she read the letter, the priceless of the mother's one moment of Paradise on earth, shaking her soul with the intensity of its wonder. Then suddenly she dropped her face in her hands and wept uncontrollably—bitterly. Like unto "Rachel weeping for her children for they were not," she wept for the happiness that she had missed—the happiness, that she had failed to bring into Peter's life in the years, that he had waited.

The hours slipped by while Phoebe sat bowed in grief over the prairie letter. Gradually there stole into her soul an intense longing to feel the baby form nestling close to her heart—to look into his face even as the mother had looked with the love of her dying eyes. Suddenly she raised her head, her heart palpitating madly with the daring suggestion whispering in her brain. She sprang to her feet, pacing the floor with frenzied restlessness. Once she paused to pull open the drawer of the walnut library table and gathering the bits of white flannel and ribbons secreted there, she pressed them to her lips. A strange calmness took possession of her restlessness, then with a little cry, half rapture half awe, she lifted the receiver of the telephone and called Peter.

PHOEBE had been West three weeks and Peter, believing that some quest of her artist's soul had lured her there impulsively, returned grimly to his home, anticipating still another lonely week. But as he entered the door, he was conscious of much commotion and laughing, crooning voices in the library. Then Phoebe's dear voice cried out her greeting.

Startled, he moved briskly toward the library, rubbing his eyes because of his bewilderment. Phoebe was there in life, sitting in a low chair, facing the blazing log of the fire-place. In her arms lay a baby and Phoebe's eyes, all tenderness, rested with the pride of motherhood on the baby face.

"Peter—Peter—it is the prairie babe—the little, crippled mother fell asleep in the Valley of Shadows. Oh, Peter, she knew our hearts were hungry. She would have wanted us to have him here to love. He—he is Little Boy Blue, and Peter, he is going to make up for all those years you waited. Peter, he will scar the furniture—he will ruffle all our beautiful dignity—but—but, Peter, he will make life sweet for us—recompense you for all that you have missed," sobbed Phoebe.

The man had not waited for her to finish. He was down on his knees beside Phoebe, his big, clumsy hands hungrily caressing the baby hands—the sleeping baby form. His eyes were wet with tears and he answered huskily:

"Phoebe, why—why it is like I dreamed it would be years and years ago. Do you s'pose I could hold him without dropping him? Say, old chap—Little Boy Blue, look up at your dad."

The baby eyelids flickered, then closed drowsily. Phoebe bent her head and pressed her lips passionately against the rose-leaf cheek and met the lips of the man, resting there. But there was silence—sweet, thrilling silence—in the library. There was no need of words for the heart of Phoebe understood the heart of Peter. The chasm had been bridged.

"It was as though she were working her lost motherhood into the layette."

sweet gratitude. I am going down into the Valley of Shadows, and somehow I seem to sense the truth, that I will not come back into the light. My one prayer is that I may be given one moment of Paradise on earth—to look into my baby's face—to hold him close to my breast. There are prairie women with big motherly hearts, who will love my babe—"

The letter ended abruptly. At the foot of the page was scrawled a note in masculine hand. It read:

"The little mother did not come back from the shadows. Her life was sacrificed for the worship of its own. The town of St. Moritz—known in the 15th century as a bathing resort, with a quaint leaning tower, the only remains of the parish church, and above all, below, on both banks of the boisterous Inn, is an unbroken line of tiny hamlets and ancient villages, with a little chapel or church forming the characteristic feature of the community.

What is, however, considered to be the most famous place of worship in the canton of the Grisons is the old Monastery of Disentis, founded in 614 A.D. by the Irish apostle Saint Sigbertus, and later richly endowed by a rich convert, Placidus. A band of Avars destroyed the original foundation in the year 670, and history indicates that the second foundation is due to Carl Martell who had a cloister and three churches erected on the spot. Numerous donations were the means of giving the monastery considerable power and influence, but the foundation had to undergo hard times during the Reformation and again in the year 1799, when the French set the village and the Convent on fire. The valuable library and collection of documents were destroyed on that occasion. Misfortune seemed to pursue the monastery, for no sooner was it reconstructed, when it again became the prey of a fire for the third time, in 1846. But the foundation bloomed a fourth time and is to-day one of the favorite Swiss pilgrimage resorts, with a school, well known for its excellent educational advantages.

At the head of the Lake Maggiore, in a veritable bower of exotic shrubs and flowers, lies Locarno, with the ancient pilgrimage church, the Madonna del Sasso, towering on a rocky pinnacle high above, a characteristic and ever-enchanted landmark for the entire region.

A funicular railway, climbing the gorge of the Ramogna, eliminates the somewhat steep ascent on foot, but those who like to linger awhile in meditation en route rejoice at the opportunity offered to them along the romantic path, the "Via della Cappella," with the 14 stations of the Cross.

On the hill-top, affording an inexpressibly beautiful view of this Eden-like portion of southern Switzerland, the solemn stillness of the cloisters dwells. The church itself was founded in 1569 and is particularly renowned for two choice oil paintings which it contains: "The Entombment," by A. Ciseri, and the "Flight Into Egypt," a masterpiece of Bramantino's. Several venerable and interesting places of worship are also found within the city of Locarno and in the lovely garden suburb of Mur-alto there stands, what is probably the oldest place of worship in the canton, San Vittore, a Romanesque church of the 11th century. In the wall of the tower there is a small marble figure, representing San Vittore, a work of great value, and the crypt of the saint, in Byzantine style, is also worthy of a visit.

The Story of a Genius Who Sang a Double Part

GAYLORD'S studio was in the third flat of the Baldwin Building, and there was no elevator, consequently, when I finished the climb, my breath was nearly exhausted. Having one's portrait painted is not at all congenial to an over-taxed physician, and I am not such a lover of art that my innate modesty is in any danger of suffering from self-adoration. Gaylord had urged me to "sit" for him, that he might make some compensation for the interest I had taken in bringing about a reconciliation between himself and my cousin Helen, the amicable result of which was their marriage. But upon recalling my struggles with those three flights of diabolical stairway, I wondered if I had done anything so very meritorious after all.

However, my repining meditation was suddenly interrupted by an incident which proved the harbinger of an extraordinary affair. When half way up the third flight of stairway, a melody of song burst forth, apparently from Gaylord's studio. Upon gaining the landing I paused to listen. The singer possessed a remarkably fine voice, of the tenor quality—not one of those sky-scraping, nickel-plated tenors, indicative of insipidity, but a melodiously resonant tenor, expressive of manhood and vigor. Moreover, the selection was "M'appari tutt' amour," from "Martha," and the singer rendered it admirably. I waited until the finish, anticipating the high B flat with no little interest. But this climax was accomplished with such ease, that I felt the magnetism of a master. I hesitated to enter the studio, but after consulting my watch, and perceiving that it was really my hour, I decided to announce myself.

My knock caused the closing bars of the accompaniment to cease instantly. The next moment the door opened, and I stood in the smiling presence of my cousin-in-law, Mr. Percival Gaylord.

"Hello, Dick," he exclaimed, in his jovial way, "how are you this morning?"

"Fine and dandy," I answered. "How are you?"

"Fit as a fiddle," he responded, merrily. "Come right in. I have been waiting for you."

As he drew me into the room, I glanced over at the piano, with the expectation of discovering some grand personage before it, but was surprised to find—no one.

"Why, where is your singer?" I asked, in an undertone.

The question seemed to embarrass him, but for answer he went over to the piano, and to my further amazement, gave the selection a more artistic interpretation than before.

"Well!" I exclaimed, when he had finished, "if any one had told me you could sing like that, I should not have believed him. Why, you are an artist in song, as well as in paint. Hello!" I cried, suddenly catching sight of a lithograph upon the wall, "so you are the great De Lasco, whom every one in Boston went wild over last season. And you are as reticent about it as a clam."

"Do you think it looks like me?" he asked, with provoking indifference, as he thrummed out a few more chords.

"Looks like you! Why, man alive, it is you!" I exclaimed, stepping closer to the picture.

He stopped playing, and lighted a cigarette; I never indulge in the cigarette habit, and he, knowing it, did not offer me one. Presently he blew a ring of smoke into the air, and came toward me.

"No, my dear Dr. Belcher," said he slowly. "You are quite mistaken—at least I think you are. That picture is supposed to represent, not me, but Robert Gaylord, who is better known as Monsieur Robert de Lasco, one of the most popular tenors of the day. You see, when I was born there were two of us, and for many years it has been a puzzle to me as to which is Robert and which Percival. One is the elder by two and a half minutes, but we got mixed in infancy, and to save my life, I cannot tell which is which. However, one of us is now in New York, with the Clecco Opera Company, and will sing in Toronto in Massey Hall on the eighth of March. I have just received a letter from Bob to this effect."

"But I never believed you could sing like that," I exclaimed, not yet recovered from my astonishment. "Why you are remarkably well trained."

He flicked the ash from his cigarette, and turned to his palette and paint tubes.

"I'm not so sure about that," he said, quietly. "I once thought I was, but you know the old adage: 'Pride goeth before destruction.' Bob and I studied together in Paris and in Vienna. But I loved the brush and mahlstick more than the footlights, and that is why I am here to-day. Bob—well, he has succeeded as I never could have, although in Paris and in Vienna I sang in opera, as his understudy. That was several years ago. At present, however, I am satisfied with portrait painting."

"But what surprises me," I pursued, "is the fact that after knowing you for nearly two years, I am only now learning of your vocal accomplishment. How have you managed to keep it so long to yourself?"

"I have not wanted it known," was his quiet reply.

"Well, by ginks!" I exclaimed, with warmth. "If I could warble like that I should take some pride in it."

"You might not be satisfied. You might want to do better," said he, slowly. "You might realize that you had reached your limit. You might be discouraged. Every man has his limit, you know, and when he reaches it, according to Emerson, he is done for."

"And is that where the shoe pinches you?" I asked, surprised at his view.

HE was arranging the colors upon his palette, and while reaching for the knife, paused to look at me, with a peculiar twinkle in his eyes. He did not get the knife, but sat back in his chair, and again flicked the ash from his cigarette.

"Dick," said he, presently, holding the cigarette a little from him, and dropping into a reflective mood, "professional singers are not to be envied. They have their troubles. The love of approbation is so easily inflated or attenuated, that there is sunshine one day and cloud the next. They are people of temperament. They live for applause, and they are troubled with petty jealousies. I doubt if there are many who do not actually suffer through adverse criticism."

"But there are exceptions," I exclaimed, earnestly, not a little surprised at this view of the matter. He blew another cloud into the air, and again held the cigarette from him.

"Oh, yes, a few," he answered. "My brother is one of them. But it was adverse criticism that knocked me out. I am too sensitive. I wish I were not. I wish I had the hide of a rhinoceros. Then they might kick, and—I would consider the source. Bob is different. When he comes, you must hear him. It will be a treat, I can assure you. By-the-way, I hope you will say nothing to Helen about my singing. She thinks I am only a portrait painter."

"Have you never sung for her?" I asked, with increased surprise.

"No. Once I tried to, but she laughed at me, and I closed up like a clam. She is rather accomplished herself, you know, and sings very well indeed. Besides, she has such stilted ideas of music, that—well, I have kept silent. Moreover, one cannot successfully serve two masters. I sing only to amuse myself. That is why I have a piano here in my studio, although, nominally, it is for the amusement of my waiting patrons. Sometimes Helen drops in and plays for me. That makes it pleasant while I work."

"But has she never caught you at it, as I did?"

"Oh, yes, once or twice, but we always laughed it off. She is the musician, you know."

I detected a slight tone of irony in his voice as he said this, and I began to wonder.

"And does she never ask you to sing?" I exclaimed with a touch of indignation.

"Never. She doesn't think that I can."

He said this with a tone color of pique, which touched my sympathy. I perceived that Helen neither understood, nor appreciated her husband. She had not yet lost her self-complacency. The realization of this set me thinking. Presently, however, I looked up to find Gaylord scrutinizing me with a professional earnestness.

"Don't move!" he admonished, "and keep on thinking."

In an instant he had seized the spatula, and had destroyed quite a lot of the portrait which he had been making of me. Then, taking up his palette and brushes, he began rapidly to give my features an entirely different expression. What the result would be I could not tell, but if it should necessitate my climbing those three flights of stairs again, I knew that I should be sorry.

Several days later I chanced to be seated in my sanctum sanctorum, when in walked my cousin, Mrs. Percival Gaylord, not a little perturbed.

"Why Helen!" I exclaimed. "What is the matter? You are quite unstrung."

"Oh, Dick," she broke forth, with an expression that hinted of a possible overflow of the lachrymal glands at any moment, "what do you think that silly husband of mine has done?"

"We awaited his advent with no little anxiety."

"Why, I have not the slightest idea," I answered with considerable interest. "He has not done anything absurd, has he?"

"Well, I am sure I don't know," she declared, with the tears welling up at last, "but just look at this."

She handed me a circular which contained the portrait and press notices of Monsieur de Lasco.

"Why, where did you get this?" I asked, and a little surprised.

"At Nord's," she answered. "The counter is full of them, and there is a large picture of Percy in the windows of nearly every store up and down Street. He is advertised to sing with the Grand Opera Company in Massey Hall on the eighth of March, and—and he has been with a week or so about it."

The humorous side of the situation presented itself so forcibly that even Gaylord's composure to keep silent appeared to be won from me all I knew.

"Why, it is a little bit of a something," she went on, after a pause. "He has never sung anything but 'Amen' since we were married, and those press notices say that he has been a great success in Europe, and New York, and Boston, and several other places."

She paused and he picked up then went on:

"Now, all you do I suppose that Percy would with these notices himself, do you? I should be awfully mortified if he did. I don't like it at all."

"Sure a little has been done," I admitted, "but I can't imagine that Percy would do it. There is nothing of the braggadocio about him. He is far too sensitive—too sensible. Have you said anything to him about this concert?"

"No. I have just discovered it," she answered, with a sigh. "This is the first time I have been down town this week. I dropped in here on my way home. I felt so upset about it."

I looked out of the window and reflected.

"Perhaps you had better ask him about it," I advised, presently.

"Indeed I shall not!" she declared, with vigor. "If he does not wish to tell me of his own accord, I shall never ask him about it, you may depend upon that. I just think it's horrid of him."

Tears came to her eyes again, and she wiped them away in such a decisive manner that I knew she was severely exercised.

"After all, Helen," said I, "have you thought that this may be only a trick of nature?"

"Why, what do you mean?" she exclaimed, looking at me, with the keenest interest.

"Have you never heard of a man having a double?"

"Why, yes. But I never supposed that another man would resemble Percy so much as that. Why, look at it, Dick, it is a speaking likeness of him."

I was compelled to admit that the picture was a very good representation of my cousin's husband. But my lips were dumb, and I exercised considerable tact in trying to reassure her.

"Do you know anything about Percy's family?" I asked.

"Very little," she answered, reflectively. "None of his relatives live in this country. I believe they are English. Do you know anything about them?"

"He is not an egotist," I made haste to reply. "And yet he is a very interesting conversationalist. Well read, cultured, and all that."

"Why, Percy has not even upheld his mother as an example for me in my culinary affairs," she said, after a moment's reflection. "I will give him credit for that. To tell you the truth, Dick, I have seldom heard him mention his family. He seems so taken up with art."

"That's the English of him," I declared. "But would it not be well to trust him?"

"You mean—"

"With regard to this," I said, holding up the circular.

"But it is all so mysterious—so unusual. I can't understand it."

"Well, don't try to understand it. You know what curiosity did to poor Pandora? Now take my advice and let matters run their course. Percy Gaylord is one of the best fellows I ever knew, and I am satisfied that whatever he does will be to his credit, and a pleasure to those who know him. If you are wise, you will not bother him with this," I added, holding up the circular again. "Let us hope that there is some great mistake about this Monsieur de Lasco. It does seem ridiculous that Percy should assume such a role, but there is the picture to reassure us, and I have never seen a better likeness. By the way!" I exclaimed, after looking more closely at the engraving, "have you noticed the pin he wears in his cravat?"

"Why, no," she answered quickly.

I handed her the circular, and waited.

"Why, what a funny thing it is!" she cried. "It looks like some kind of a bug."

"A Brazilian beetle," I replied. "They are sometimes mounted in that way."

"Why, Dick," she went on, in ecstasy, "Percy hasn't a pin like that, I am positive. Why, perhaps, after all, it is only a mistake. Yes, it must be one of those strange freaks of nature, which produces a man's double, and it isn't Percy at all. Oh, I am so glad you mentioned the pin. He never wore one like that I am sure. Now I shall speak to him about it. It will be such fun. Oh, Dick, I am so glad I came to you. I would not have discovered it myself. Now I must go."

She was all smiles now, and when she arose to take her leave she shook hands so heartily that I was amply rewarded for having put her fears to flight. Nevertheless, I could not suppress a feeling of commiseration for her in her shortsightedness. Through a certain superficiality she was nourishing an element of discord in her home. Had she been less selfish, less supercilious, and more considerate, she might have helped her oversensitive husband considerably, and won his lasting devotion. As it was, I wondered how soon he would become a "Club man." Poor Helen.

SINCE a concert in Massey Hall, with a programme of celebrated artists, is usually a brilliant affair, the great Clecco entertainment promised to be interesting.

I had been invited to dine at the Gaylord domicile, and attend the concert with Percy, Helen and my aunt, Mrs. Mortimer. Gaylord greeted me with a hearty welcome, then, before I had seen anyone, he ushered me into his den.

"Dick," said he, with more enthusiasm than usual, "I have told Helen about Bob, but I want you to keep silent about having heard me sing, or you will spoil the fun."

"Oh, so there is going to be some fun, eh?" I remarked. "Is your brother to dine with us?"

"No, but he will be with us after the concert."

"Well, I'll be careful, so rest easy."

Wondering what was in the wind, but determining to await further developments, I followed Gaylord down stairs, where we joined the ladies.

We were a merry quartette at dinner, and I do not remember having seen Gaylord so spirited before. His eyes fairly sparkled with good humor, and there was a ruddiness in his face, which, on account of a natural pallor, was quite unusual, indicative of excitement. Gaylord was of a quiet nature, but whenever he chose he could make things interesting. At Massey Hall, however, sedateness governed our deportment, and anticipation kept our nerves titillating with a strange uneasiness.

De Lasco was, of course, the great attraction for us, but there was a promise of good things in the celebrated Italian pianist, Clecco, and in the renowned French soprano, Madame Talma, while Signora Cassabini was sure to charm all lovers of the harp with her numbers, and I, for one, looked forward to the evening's entertainment with considerable pleasure.

We had secured the lower right hand box, and were in a good position to watch the Hall fill with the usual crowd. Gaylord seemed greatly pleased that Bob should have so fine an audience. It was always Bob with him. The other entertainers were simply secondaries. But when Madame Talma made her appearance, as first on the programme, and acquitted herself in a very satisfactory manner, Gaylord was as enthusiastic with his applause as anyone.

After her came Signor Clecco, a distinguished looking Italian, with a decidedly awkward manner, a homely countenance, and a head of hair that might have been the envy of any football player present. But when he touched the piano, everything was superseded by his wonderful genius. His first selections carried the audience by storm, and when finally permitted to cease his automatic acknowledgments, he must have been well satisfied with himself and his reception.

De Lasco was third upon the programme, and we awaited his advent with no little anxiety. Helen was nervous; her mother unusually quiet, and Gaylord apparently indifferent. As for me, I hoped that De Lasco would carry off the palm, and feared mightily that he would not. Presently, in the midst of a hearty applause, he made his appearance, and if Gaylord had not been sitting at my side, I should have believed him upon the stage before us.

"What a resemblance!" I heard Helen whisper to her mother.

"Remarkable!" answered my aunt.

Then they leaned forward to listen, and I perceived that Helen was deeply interested.

De Lasco looked over at us and smiled; then the prelude of his selection began. In another moment the great Hall was reverberating with the exquisite melody of his song, and everyone was listening with rapt attention. De Lasco seemed so phenomenal, so dramatic, so accomplished, that I gave myself up to the spell of his genius, and reveled in the glory of his voice. The sweetness of tone, the phrasing, the technique, the beautiful management of his crescendos and diminuendos, together with the infusion of temperament, magnetism, sympathy—call it what you will—combined to make a surpassing success. He was enthusiastically recalled, and finally responded with a dainty little encore piece, which won him another round of applause. From that moment he was undoubtedly established in the hearts of the people. It was his first appearance in Toronto, but he had won a hearty approval. We were delighted. The tension of our anxiety relaxed. He was ours and his success filled us with happiness. Therefore, we anticipated the next number with pleasure.

Signora Cassabini was equal to all expectations. To me the rich mellow tones of her instrument were delicious, and I found myself wondering why the harp is not taught in this country. Every young woman is expected to play the piano, as a natural sequence of her education, but the harp would be an innovation. For this reason, perhaps, Signora Cassabini was remarkably successful in pleasing her audience, and was compelled to give two encores for one selection.

The first part of the programme being now finished, the intermission was at hand. In our box we were all excitement and enthusiasm over De Lasco. His resemblance to Gaylord was the chief topic, and his marvelous singing the greatest subject for comment. Helen was enraptured.

"Oh, Percy," she exclaimed, with considerable warmth, "if you could only sing like that!"

Gaylord regarded her with a searching gaze.

"You would be altogether too critical with me, my dear," was his quiet comment.

"No indeed. You would be beyond criticism," she replied, earnestly. "Oh why didn't nature give you the voice as well as the resemblance? Just think of what we might do. You with such vocal ability, I with the piano! It is really too bad. But dear, I do hope that after to-night you will try something else than 'Answer.' I am getting a little tired of 'There is a heart which heaven has made for thee, etc.'"

Helen's mimicry produced a burst of laughter from us, in the midst of which Gaylord bent forward and selected a small red rose from her bouquet. Pinning this upon his lapel, he presently excused himself, with the remark that he was going back to see Bob, and I was unceremoniously left to the tender mercies of Helen and her mother.

The intermission was unusually long, but before Gaylord returned the second part of the programme had begun. Madame Talma sang, Signor Clecco played, and the Signora's harp was placed in position before Gaylord made his appearance. We wondered what was keeping him. It was not until the Signora and De Lasco came upon the stage, for the Beethoven number, that my cousin-in-law returned to our box. Then I noticed a slight difference in his manner, and a violet boutonniere in his lapel. I observed also that De Lasco wore the rose. Helen noticed it immediately.

"You gave him my rose!" she exclaimed, a little surprised, as Gaylord seated himself.

"He would have it," was the almost whispered reply.

But the music began, and we were all attention. Again I could not help remarking the remarkable resemblance between these two brothers. Even their manner, and little idiosyncrasies were alike. Had I not known the difference at that moment, I should have mistaken the one for the other.

The song was even a more pronounced success than the first, the harp accompaniment being a great acquisition. With remarkable enthusiasm the audience demanded an encore. De Lasco responded with "M'appari tutt' amour." Then with a start that nearly took away my breath, I realized that something unusual had happened. Helen was entranced, and I aroused her without ceremony.

"Helen," I whispered, "ask Percy how soon he will have my portrait finished."

She turned to do so, then started back in amazement.

"Why—why—" she gasped, and passed her hand over her eyes, as if to clear a mist from them.

The gentleman at her side smiled, as he bowed and said:

"It was Percy's idea, Madame. We arranged it as a little surprise. He has done remarkably well to-night, and I am proud of him."

We were a jolly party on our way home, but I could not help noticing that, in spite of our merriment, for some reason or other Helen was peeved.

An "Inch High" Icing

AVE you ever wondered how to make a fluffy "inch-high" icing, soft inside—but glossy and smooth on top?

It was my discovery one day while icing a cake, that the addition of Knox Sparkling Gelatine made a higher, softer, better frosting, one that looked as though six egg whites had been used in it instead of just two! And so I have been using it in my "fluffy inch-high" icings—as my friends call them ever since.

Try the following recipe for yourself. It is sure to please you, for it is economical and the egg yolks left from the icing can be used in making the cake.

Served alone or with coffee whip—made from the coffee left over from breakfast—it makes a delightful ending to a simple home luncheon or dinner.

FLUFFY ICING

1 teaspoonful Knox Sparkling Gelatine
2 tablespoonfuls cold water
1/2 teaspoonful vanilla 1/4 cup hot water
1 cup sugar 2 egg whites

Soak gelatine in cold water and dissolve by melting over hot water. Add sugar to the 1/4 cupful of hot water and cook directly over fire until syrup will spin a thread. Turn out heat, or remove pan from fire, and add liquid gelatine immediately, pouring it through strainer into the syrup. Have egg whites beaten until stiff on a platter, and very slowly add syrup, beating constantly between additions. When all the syrup has been added, add vanilla. (or a combination of vanilla and 1 teaspoonful of orange extract if desired), pour icing in top of double boiler and cook over hot water, beating constantly with a slotted or other wooden spoon. When icing becomes so thick spoon can be drawn through it without icing running together again, spread quickly on cake, evening top with a broad bladed knife. If the icing should lose its shine, continue icing cake as usual but leave a little of the icing in the double boiler; to this add two or three tablespoonfuls hot water and cook until thickened, but not as thick as the first icing. Pour this on top of the dull icing and a glossy finish will be the result.

If desired, half of this recipe may be used as a cake filling previous to cooking in the double boiler, and the other half used as an icing. This quantity will make an inch-high icing for the top of a medium-sized cake. For a layer cake, double the quantities given here.

COFFEE WHIP

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/2 cup cold water
2 cups clear strong coffee
3/4 cup sugar Juice of one lemon

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in hot coffee; add lemon juice and sugar, stir until dissolved. Cool and strain. When partially thickened, beat with fork or egg whip until light and fluffy and turn into a mold, first dipped in cold water. Serve with milk or cream.

One box of Knox Sparkling Gelatine makes twenty-four individual servings or serves a family of six with four different desserts or salads for four different meals.

Not only fluffy icings, but delicate marshmallow frostings and cake fillings, too, can be made with Knox Sparkling Gelatine together with salads, relishes, meat and fish molds, and an endless number of delicious desserts.

Send for your recipe books "Dainty Desserts" and "Food Economies" in which you will find many more economical recipes and "seasonal occasion" dishes. I will send them to you upon request if you enclose a 2c stamp for postage and mention your grocer's name.

HOME-MADE FURNITURE

This Neat Little Chair Is As Comfortable
a Seat As the Small Person Could Desire

THE FOURTH ARTICLE

THE instructor of the school craftsman has before him a task pleasant and easy, if it be compared with the difficulties confronting the older workman who would execute real objects after the models which are here presented. Such difficulties, although not arising from conditions of material or construction, are no less hard to overcome than if they were of external origin. They reside in the mind of the workman, obscuring his perception and, at first, disaffecting him from the object to be created. While the child craftsman comes to his task free from prejudice and eager to employ his restless activities, the older amateur has ideas more or less faulty, according as he has produced many or few objects, after the models usually proposed for inexperienced or medium pieces of cabinet-making.

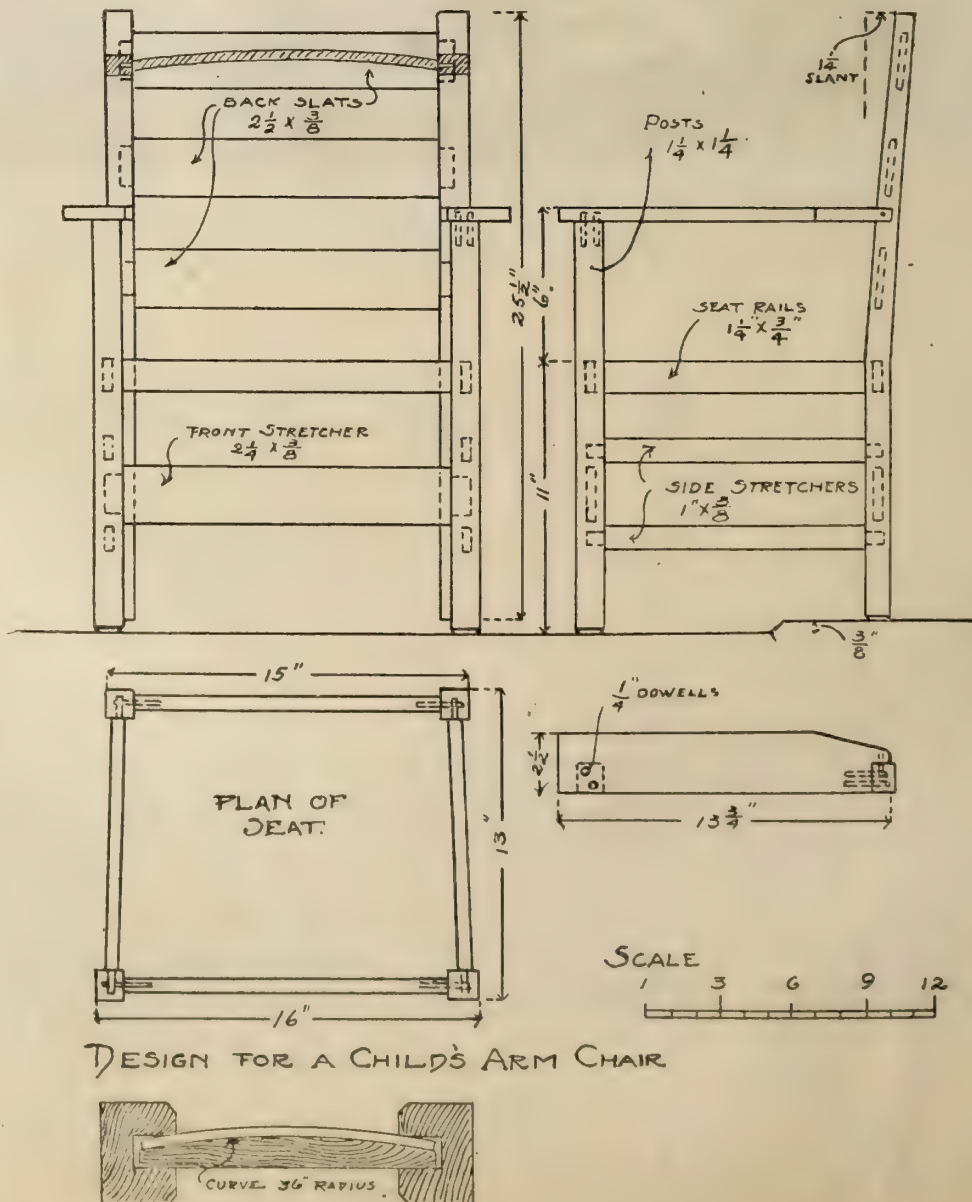

Thus, by following unworthy principles of construction and decoration, he has acquired a taste for false line and misplaced ornament. The child, on the contrary, in learning to execute these almost primitive chairs and tables, receives the rudiments of one of the most useful of crafts, just as in other departments of his school, he is taught the first principles of language and of the science of numbers. Or, to draw a parallel from a yet earlier period of his life, he may be said to follow the lessons in construction offered, just as he frames the first sentences of his speech, wherein he uses only nouns and verbs: the names of people and things, joined to words expressing the actions or states attributed to them. That is, in both cases, he confines himself to efforts which are purely structural. He begins aright, and, if wisely directed, will attain a useful result.

IN building this chair put all together excepting the arms, and when the glue is dry the arm dowels are fitted and the back ones shoved into place; then, by pressure, the front will spring into its proper position. All dowels are well glued, and the glue is warmed before using. Attention is called also to the joining of the seat rails, also the three-eighths of an inch cut from the bottom of the back post after the chair is put together. This makes a little slant back to the seat, and gives a comfortable position to the sitter. The back slats of the chairs are slightly curved. This is done by thoroughly wetting or steaming the wood and pressing it into shape—then allowing it to dry. The accompanying drawing will illustrate a device for this purpose, which for the amateur is quite as practical as a steam press.

The older persons attempting to work out these problems, in a large number of cases might be compared to those adults who, although imperfectly educated in language, have yet, through reading and association, acquired a fund of expressions and constructions which they habitually misuse and misfit together, with the result of producing in their speech an effect of distressing vulgarity. Such workmen must therefore forget the perverted forms of the tables and chairs which have so long met their eyes in shops, in their own homes, and in pieces of their own making. They must revert to essentials, to the bare nouns and verbs of their craft. They did not begin aright. Consequently they must begin anew. They must correct their errors of vision and taste, before they can appreciate simplicity and the beauty which results from the adaptability of the object to the use for which it is designed.

Assuredly, then, the young craftsman has the advantages upon his side, and from these rudimentary lessons in the minor building art, it is not impossible for him to proceed slowly to the greater art which we name architecture; since the same principles are involved in the lesser and in the greater. A not unworthy preparation for housebuilding lies in the process of constructing a chair or table: in the proper relative placing of verticals and horizontals, in a knowledge of the functions of mortise and tenon, and of other structural features.

Quebec Homemakers' Clubs Convention

THE 7th Annual Convention of the Quebec Homemakers' Clubs, was held at Macdonald College, on Wednesday and Thursday, June 16th and 17th, with seventy-nine delegates in attendance.

The first session was held in the Assembly Hall of the College presided over by Miss S. J. Armstrong, Provincial President. The address of welcome was given by Miss A. E. Hill, Head of the School of Household Science, who expressed her pleasure at the privilege accorded her of welcoming so many delegates. Miss Hill stated that she had been present at every Convention of the Clubs from the first one in the Winter of 1914, when only a few earnest members met to discuss plans, to the meeting of to-day when such a number testified to the great advancement made. Each year had its own outstanding thought, and this year it seemed that the Clubs of Quebec had reached the same point that Canada had reached in the world, that of an independent organization, part of a great body, and just as Canada in taking her place as a nation among the nations in the Empire, must state her ideals and give evidence of her ability to carry these out, so the Quebec Homemakers' Clubs as a firmly established organization, part of the greater federal body, must definitely prepare to carry on the work and ideals for which they stand.

Mrs. McCurdy of Lennoxville, replied to the address of welcome, and after thanking Miss Hill for her welcome, went on to state the advantage to the clubs of having each year the opportunity of meeting at Macdonald. It showed a recognition of the value of the organization and of the importance of women's work and influence. Women to-day were taking their place side by side with men in practically every sphere of activity. The influence of women had always been recognized by the great writers and from the earliest times women have been the inspiration which led to deeds of heroism. Woman's influence is most felt in the home where she reigns supreme, but it must also be recognized beyond the home. To-day women are responsible for much of what was undesirable in the world chiefly because of thoughtlessness. What was needed was a greater thoughtfulness and a saner outlook on life.

Miss Armstrong then addressed the meeting on some of the problems confronting the women of the Homemakers' Clubs, most of whom were women from the farming community. These problems included the shortage of labor, and the difficulty of getting necessary work done. Labor saving devices should be used and advantage taken of the great natural resources of the Province to furnish power for home conveniences. The unrest of the present generation showed the need of more earnest thought, and this could be brought about by promoting a love for good books and the establishment of social centres. Community interests, particularly in the matter of education and the betterment of our schools, should receive the attention of every mother and club member. Parent-teacher's Clubs were instanced as a means of encouraging co-operation between home and school.

Miss Chute, Superintendent of the Clubs, then presented the annual report in which the work of the clubs for the year was reviewed. Fifty-one clubs with a membership of over 1,100, were now in existence, new clubs having been formed during the year at Hillhead, Jerusalem, Upper Lachute, Alcouve, West Templeton, Brookbury, Lemesurier, Cleveland, North Hatley, Vinton and Foster. One hundred and forty lectures and demonstrations had been given to clubs and schools by the Extension Staff and four by members of the Staff of the School of Household Science and School of Agriculture.

stant use. Miss Kirby, formerly of the Extension Staff, had gone in February to take a position with the Soldier Settlement Board, and Miss Crane was now assisting Miss Buzzell in the work of demonstrating. Over six thousand dollars had been handled by the clubs.

New plans for the future seemed to centre around Child Welfare work, helping wherever possible the wives of our soldiers on the land to become familiar with their new conditions gardens and how records are kept. Miss Buzzell followed with a demonstration of the work carried on by the Household Science Extension Department in the Schools. Project work in Cookery and Sewing was explained and Miss Buzzell showed examples of the type of work called for and illustrated how the different articles were judged. Mr. J. H. McQuat then spoke on the work of the English School Fairs, giving a short history of the Fairs and how the work was carried on among the children at their home plots and at the fairs in the Autumn.

The evening meeting presided over by Miss Philip, opened with several much appreciated selections on the organ given by Mr. Stanton. The speaker of the evening, Dr. Helen MacMurchy, Chief of the Child Welfare Department in the Federal Ministry of Health, was then introduced. Dr. MacMurchy in opening her address on "Child Welfare," referred to the enjoyable day she had spent attending the meetings of the Clubs. She then went on to speak of the obligations resting upon the people of Canada as a result of their deliverance from the horrors of the great war. Home and freedom had been won for them and it remained to be seen how they would show their gratitude. She felt that already many had realized that each one should endeavor to raise the standards of the race by demanding more of themselves and looking for more in others. A general improvement could only come through raising the standard of our homes. The home was the essential thing and advancement of the race was only possible where the home life made for the highest ideals. Signs of improved conditions showed in movements for better health and the Ministry of Health in Great Britain, which was established after many years of effort, was followed in 1919 by the establishment of a similar Ministry in Canada.

Should the enquiry be made as to why such a healthy country as Canada should require a Ministry of Health, one had only to refer to statistics to prove that it was necessary. Two tests, the proportion of deaths from typhoid and the rate of infant mortality, showed that many parts of Canada ranked only third or fourth class in the former, and in the latter our records were far worse than those of such congested areas as London, England. Canada's record in tuberculosis also showed lamentable carelessness and neglect. The speaker referred to the importance being placed to-day on the matter of Child Welfare by all civilized nations and instanced the attention paid to the milk supply for children by the British Children Government during the war and the emphasis placed on the same question of Child Welfare at the Great Red Cross Conference at Cannes, after the war was over. The Canadian department proposed to carry on their work through the Provinces and Dr. MacMurchy invited and urged the clubs to send in to the department reports as to their needs in this line, and suggestions as to literature, etc., that would be of assistance in promoting the work.

The business meeting of the Convention opened at 8.30 a.m., on June 17th, with Miss Chute presiding. A telegram was read from Mrs. Murphy, President of the

Now Brush Teeth In the new way—Remove the film

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Try this new way of teeth cleaning. The test is free. It has brought to millions whiter, safer teeth. Leading dentists everywhere advise it.

See the results, then learn what they mean to you.

What ruins teeth

Teeth are ruined by a film. You can feel it—that viscous coat. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. And most tooth troubles are now traced to it.

It is this film-coat that discolors—not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Brushed in the usual way, much of that film is left. And very few people have escaped the troubles that it causes.

Now we combat it

Dental science has in late years found a way to fight film, day by day. High authorities have proved it by many careful tests.

Millions of people have adopted it, largely by dental advice. To careful people it is bringing a new era in teeth cleaning.

These new methods are all embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And you are urged to prove it by a pleasant ten-day test.

Five important effects

Pepsodent has five effects, all of them essential to cleaner, safer teeth. One ingredient is pepsin. One multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva to combat starch deposits that cling. One multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva to neutralize mouth acids.

In two ways it attacks the film, directly. Then it keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily cling.

It differs vastly from the old-time tooth pastes, which dentists now know were wrong.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Within a week you will know that your teeth are protected as they never were before. And you will always want your teeth to look and feel like that. Cut out the coupon now.

Some Things You Can Make With Honey

By MARION HARRIS NEIL

AUTHOR OF "THE THRIFT COOK BOOK."

NOW that sugar is so scarce and expensive it is possible that honey may be more largely used for sweetening purposes, as it was in the days before the Crusaders or the Saracens reintroduced "sokkar," or "zucchera," into Europe. During the middle Ages it was too costly to be in general use, so honey was substituted in the making of sweet dishes and candies, and in the preserving of fruits and the many syrups so popular in those days. At this period the product of "the busy bees" was highly esteemed, not only as a food but also for medicinal purposes. In medicine, honey was regarded as a diuretic, aperient, and detergent. As a pectoral and emolgent, it is still used. An excellent gargle (at once something cleansing and astringent) is made of honey and vinegar; and, with certain fats, it forms ointments.

In other countries cakes, syrups, and bonbons, flavored with honey are far more popular than they are with us. Puddings of tapioca, rice, sago, and vermicelli, sweetened with honey, are both delicious and wholesome, and by no means extravagant, even considering the high price of honey at present, as it is so sweet that a small quantity suffices. Honey flavored blanc manges, jellies and preserves deserve to be better known, and a pleasant, soothing drink is made by beating up a fresh egg with a tablespoonful of honey, adding a cupful of hot milk.

Honey deserves a far more conspicuous place in cookery than the one it occupies. To realize its full value is to know that in cake making it surpasses sugar in sweetening qualities.

The following recipes are worth trying:—

Honey Tarts.—Wash one-half pound of figs and cut them in small pieces, simmer in one and one-half cupfuls of water for thirty minutes, then add one-half cupful of honey and cook for ten minutes longer. Remove from the fire and cool, then add one teaspoonful of vanilla extract, one-half cupful of chopped nut meats and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Line tartlet tins with pastry, divide the honey mixture into them and bake in a hot oven until ready. Beat up the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth, add one tablespoonful of sugar and beat again. Put a little of this meringue on the top of each tart and brown slightly in the oven.

Honey and Raisin Pudding.—Stone one-half pound of raisins and divide them in halves. Grease a pudding mold and stick the raisins all over it. Chop one-fourth pound of suet, put it into a bowl, add one and one-half tablespoonfuls of sago, one-half cupful of honey, a pinch of salt, one teaspoonful of orange extract and one cupful of bread crumbs. Mix all well together, and then put it carefully into the prepared mold. Cover with a greased paper and steam steadily for two hours. Turn out and serve with hot milk.

Honey Bread Cake.—When making bread take off two cupfuls of the dough, put it into a bowl, add one-half cupful of butter, one cupful of honey, two well beaten eggs and one cupful of cleaned currants. Beat until the mixture is smooth, then add the grated rind of one lemon and turn into a shallow greased pan. Allow to rise in a warm place, and when light sprinkle the top with chopped nut meats, and bake in a moderate oven for forty minutes.

Honeyed Pears.—Take sound Bartlett pears, wash in cold water, core, pare and cut in quarters. Place in water adding a little lemon juice to prevent discoloration. Boil one cupful of honey and one cupful of water for five minutes. Put pears in wire basket, blanch one and one-half minutes in boiling water, then dip instantly in water as cold as possible; drain and pack into hot sterilized jars. Then fill the jars with the boiling hot syrup, adjust rubbers, cover to seal partly, and sterilize under boiling water for twenty minutes for quart jars. Seal and test for leaks. Label and keep in a cool place.

Honey Cookies.—Cook one cupful of honey with one-fourth cupful of butter for five minutes, remove from the fire and pour into a bowl. Then add two and one-fourth cupfuls of sifted flour, grated rind of one lemon, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered nutmeg and allspice and one-eighth teaspoonful of salt. When cool, sift in two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and mix again. Allow to stand in a cool place over night. Roll thin and cut into cookies, place in a greased baking tin and bake in a moderate oven until amber color. These cookies keep well.

Honey Candy.—Pour two cupfuls of honey into a saucepan, add one-half pound of grated chocolate, one-half teaspoonful of powdered nutmeg, one teaspoonful of powdered mace and two and three-fourth pounds of chopped nut meats, and boil to 245°F., on candy thermometer, or until the mixture forms a hard ball when tested in cold water. Pour into a tin dusted with sugar, and when cool, roll out on a board also dusted with sugar, cut into neat squares, place in a slow oven to dry. Keep in airtight tins.

Honey Sandwiches.—Make and bake some pastry slices, split them and let them cool. Then place a slice of honey in the comb between the pieces, sprinkle lightly with sugar, and serve at once. Cake slices may be used in place of the pastry.

Honey Fruit Salad.—Boil one cupful of honey with one-half cupful of water for five minutes, then add the strained juice of two lemons. Pour over diced bananas, preserved strawberries, the pulp of two oranges, and sliced canned pineapple cut in small pieces. Serve cold in glass dishes.

Baked Apples With Honey Filling.—Peel and core six good sized apples. Mix one cupful of bread crumbs with one-half cupful of honey, and one-half teaspoonful each of powdered ginger and lemon extract. Fill the centers of the apples with the honey mixture and bake in a well greased fireproof dish. Serve hot.

Gingersnaps.—Into a double boiler put three-fourths cupful of butter, one cupful of honey and two and one-half teaspoonfuls of powdered ginger. Allow to cook for four minutes after reaching the boiling point. Remove from the fire and allow to chill, then stir in enough flour to make the mixture quite stiff, adding one teaspoonful of baking powder. Roll out thin on a well floured baking board, cut into small rounds, place on greased tins and bake in a brisk oven.

Honey Fruit Cake.—Beat together until creamy one and one-half cupfuls of honey with one cupful of butter. Add gradually, in alternate small quantities, two well beaten eggs, one-half cupful of milk, three cupfuls of flour sifted with one tablespoonful of baking powder, one cupful of seedless raisins, one cupful of currants, one-half cupful of shredded citron peel, and two teaspoonfuls each of powdered cinnamon and allspice. When well mixed turn into a deep, well greased and floured cake pan and bake in a moderate oven.

Honey Salad Dressing.—Beat one egg until frothy, then add two tablespoonfuls of honey, one-fourth teaspoonful of mustard, salt, pepper and paprika to taste; stir well together, then add one-half cupful of vinegar or lemon juice, and allow to come to a boil, stirring all the time. Allow to cool and add one cupful of whipped evaporated milk or thick cream just before using. Serve with any green vegetable.

Excellent Ways of Cooking Tongue

—Dishes to Please the Taste of Every Member of the Household

A dish of tongue, rice and carrots.

An Informing Article on the Subject of Tongues

By

MARION HARRIS NEIL

Author of "Salads, Sandwiches and Chafing Dish Recipes"

WHEN choosing an ox tongue, select one with a smooth skin, as a very rough skin is a sign of age. Wash and scrape off all the slimy substance. A tongue fresh from the pickle need not be soaked unless it has been very much salted, then two and one-half hours in cold water will be sufficient. A tongue that has been smoked will require twelve hours soaking, at least.

Ox Tongue with Cauliflower and Beans.—Soak the tongue, then run a skewer under it to keep it in good shape; put it into plenty of cold water; when it boils, skim it carefully, and then simmer for three and one-half hours. When the tongue is tender, take it up, plunge it into cold water, so that the skin will come away more easily, and skin it carefully, beginning at the point. Truss it into shape on a board by fastening it down at the root and the tip with fine skewers. When cold, take it up, trim some of the fat from the root, and glaze the tongue. Garnish with cooked cauliflower and cooked beans, and, if desired, decorate with beat butter. To make the glaze: Boil one-half cupful of water or stock, one-half teaspoonful over this another layer of tongue and season as before. Repeat this until a sufficient quantity of the tongue has been treated; let it remain in a cool place for three or four hours. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter substitute into a saucepan or a chafing dish, and when very hot add the slices of tongue and heat thoroughly. Add more shortening as required. Serve hot garnished with parsley.

Jellied Tongue.—One large cooked tongue, four and one-half tablespoonfuls of gelatine, one cupful of water or the liquid the tongue was cooked in, three cupfuls of gravy, one bunch of herbs, and one hard-cooked egg. Mix gelatine with liquid, gravy, herbs, and allow to dissolve, strain and cool. Rinse a mold with cold water, pour a little of the jelly into the bottom of the mold and allow it to firm, then arrange a layer of the hard-cooked egg cut in slices on it, pour in a little more jelly and allow it to firm, then a layer of tongue, and so on until the mould is full. Put in the refrigerator over night, turn out and garnish with slices of lemon and sprigs of parsley.

parsley and seasonings. Melt the butter in a small omelette or frying pan; when quite hot, pour in the mixture, stir slowly with a fork over a quick fire. When quite set, tip the pan toward you and scrape all the mixture toward the handle, allow it to take color in the oven, then turn it out on to a hot platter, and serve immediately.

Cream of Tongue Soup.—Take the liquor in which a tongue has been boiled, add to it two diced carrots, one diced turnip, two diced onions, and some chopped celery, boil for three hours, then strain it. Reheat, adding one cupful of hot cream or milk. Serve garnished with chopped parsley.

Roast Ox Tongue.—Rub a fresh ox tongue with one-half pound of coarse salt, and leave for three days. Then wash it and boil it in boiling stock or water gently for two and one-half hours, peel off the skin, and brush the tongue over with beaten egg or milk, and cover it with plenty of fine breadcrumbs. Now roast or bake it for forty minutes, basting it with hot drippings. Serve with hot brown sauce.

On the left is seen a dish of ox tongue with beans and cauliflower. On the right is pictured a simple tongue salad. Below is a dish of piquant deviled tongue.

of meat extract and one tablespoonful of gelatine for five minutes, then brush the tongue twice with this glaze. To make the beat butter: Beat three tablespoonfuls of butter with a wooden spoon until soft and smooth, then add three teaspoonfuls of flour, and mix well. If desired, the butter may be made pink or green with a few drops of vegetable color. Put the butter into a forcing bag with a star tube, and with it decorate the tongue.

Tongue on Toast.—Break two eggs into a saucepan, add one tablespoonful of milk or cream, two tablespoonfuls of butter, the pulp of two tomatoes, one cupful of chopped cooked tongue, one-half teaspoonful of salt and a few grains of paprika. Stir well over the fire until thoroughly heated. Have some buttered rounds of toast on hot serving dishes, pile on the mixture, garnish with parsley, and serve hot.

Tongue with Rice and Carrots.—Skin three small tongues carefully; boil for seven minutes in slightly salted water. Put four slices of fat bacon into a saucepan and cook with it one sliced onion. When the onion has browned, put in the tongues, season with chopped parsley, and salt and pepper to taste; pour in two cupfuls of brown stock, cover, and cook gently for thirty minutes. Serve hot with boiled rice and glazed carrots. To make the glazed carrots: Cut carrots into neat pieces, and put them into a saucepan with enough stock to cover them, add two tablespoonfuls of butter and one teaspoonful of grated maple sugar. Cook in the oven or by the side of the fire without covering the pan, so that by the time the cooking is finished, the liquid has evaporated and the carrots are coated with a thick gravy or glaze.

Simple Tongue Salad.—Chop fine one cold cooked tongue, add two hard cooked eggs chopped fine, one cupful of chopped celery, one-half jar of chow chow, a pinch of red pepper, salt to taste, one small chopped onion and one-half tablespoonful of lemon juice or vinegar. Mix and serve on crisp lettuce leaves and pass mayonnaise or boiled dressing.

Deviled Tongue.—Cut into slices a good-sized boiled tongue; put a layer of the tongue on a platter; sprinkle over with dry mustard, red pepper to taste and one tablespoonful of salad oil; place

Tongue with Raisin Sauce.—Trim and wash a fresh beef tongue, put it into a saucepan, cover with boiling water, add one teaspoonful of salt, and simmer for two hours. Take it out, remove the skin and put it into another kettle, add one small sliced onion, one carrot scraped and diced, six whole white peppercorns, six cloves, one bay leaf, one teaspoonful of salt, two cupfuls of seeded raisins and two quarts of boiling water. Cover and cook gently for two and one-half hours longer. Slightly thicken a portion of the liquor with a little flour, add the raisins and the vegetables, and serve with the tongue as a sauce.

Tongue Sandwiches.—Remove the crusts from bread stale enough to cut nicely, butter and cut into thin slices. Chop one and one-half cupfuls of cold tongue, add three tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, and a few drops of onion juice, and mix well together. Spread on the bread and roll each slice, carefully tying with narrow ribbon.

Tongue Omelette.—Four eggs, four tablespoonfuls of chopped cooked tongue, two tablespoonfuls of milk or cream, one teaspoonful of chopped parsley, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper and two tablespoonfuls of butter. Break the eggs into a bowl, beat them until frothy, then add the tongue, milk or cream,

Braised Tongue.—One fresh ox tongue, one carrot, one turnip, two onions, one bunch of celery, four tablespoonfuls of drippings, one tablespoonful of flour, the strained juice of one lemon, one bunch of herbs, salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Wash the tongue first in lukewarm water and then in cold water, until thoroughly cleansed. Then put it into a large saucepan with hot water to cover it and a little salt, and let it cook gently for two hours, skimming when necessary. Now lift the tongue out of the water, skin it, trim it neatly and skewer it into a round shape, fastening the tip round the thick part. Melt the drippings in a saucepan, add the vegetables all cut up into small pieces, fry them until they are nicely browned, and lift them out on to a plate. Coat the tongue on all sides with flour, put it into the hot fat left in the pan, and brown it also, turning it over and over. Return the vegetables, add six cupfuls of the liquor the tongue was boiled in, add the bunch of herbs, and put the lid on the pan. When it has cooked for one and one-half hours turn it over, strain the lemon juice on the top, and cook it for three-fourths of an hour longer, and by this time it ought to be quite tender. Lift it out, put it on a hot platter, and keep it warm. Strain the gravy and boil it quickly until there is sufficient to pour round and over the tongue. Serve the vegetables separately, and also hot tomato sauce.

Tongue in Tomatoes.—Chop very fine, or grate the tip of a cold cooked tongue sufficient to make four tablespoonfuls, put this into a saucepan with two tablespoonfuls of drippings, one egg beaten, one-half cupful of milk or cream, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika and a pinch of powdered nutmeg, and stir over the fire until it thickens. Cut four well-shaped tomatoes in halves, remove the seeds, season with pepper and salt, dot with butter, and cook in a moderate oven. Put each half of tomato on a piece of buttered toast, and fill them with the tongue mixture. Serve hot as a breakfast dish.

The Story of a September Journey

TOIL

OVER OVER

AS Diddy Happen and Dedder Naherrin entered upon the September road, the procession that they had seen in the distance came nearer and nearer. A small, white stone by the wayside marked the first Monday of the month, and it was here that Diddy, Dedder, and the little If halted to see the procession pass by.

"Why, they're all letter-men!" exclaimed Diddy. "Why are there so many of them, and why are they marching?"

"This is the Labor Day parade of all the working word-people," replied Dedder Naherrin.

"Oh, I can make them out now," cried Diddy. "WORK, comes first, and then there is the band. Each band-man is a PAY, and all the rest of the

"Are there really beds in that box? Why, it wouldn't hold one big enough for me."

"Yes, there are beds in the box, homes for little winter sleepers, and before long, birds, butterflies, and all those who hide away through the cold, will come for their beds," said Dedder Naherrin.

"But birds don't sleep all winter," objected Diddy.

"They must have winter beds just the same," said Dedder.

Diddy wished to open the box, but it was locked, and Dedder told him that the only key which would open it was one Jack Frost had.

There was not as much sunshine, the air was cooler, and the grass had lost much of the fresh green of summer.

letter-men seem to like the tune they play."

After the first band had passed, there came more letter-men—L A B O R, T O I L, and many others. There was more music from the WAGE band. All the letter-men were cheerful and happy, but the most contented-looking were the word-men who formed the last of the parade. They were the RESTS, and though they played no tunes, Diddy could see that they were liked even better than the bands.

The flags and the gay music had passed, and Diddy and his friends went on along the broad September road. The flowers by the roadside were deeper and quieter in hue, dahlias and asters, and the golden-rod was everywhere. There were orchards, too, with ripening fruit, and along this part of the road the travellers journeyed slowly.

Dedder Naherrin would linger under the apple trees, and Diddy would stop whenever he came to a peach-orchard. They would stop at every plum-tree, and rang the little silver bell on the end of his tail until Diddy would come and pick plums for him.

Presently they came to a little dip in the road, and saw in the middle of the path a square black box, on which were printed these letters—BEDS. Diddy looked at Dedder Naherrin in astonishment as he asked the old man:

TEST

Here it was that the travellers, after climbing quite a long slope, found before them a short, steep hill, down which ever so many letter-men were turning cart-wheels. Diddy stared in amazement, for, whether the letter-men stood on their hands or their feet, they seemed to be right-side-up.

"Who are they?" asked Diddy.

"The OVER and OVER men," replied Dedder Naherrin.

"They can't help doing that, for, if they did, they would be just OVERS."

At the bottom of the hill the OVER and OVERS disappeared, and when the travellers reached there too, they found themselves on the edge of the steep bank of a stream whose waters ran both ways at once. That part of the stream nearest Diddy and his friends flowed to the right, while the current nearest the farthest bank ran to the left. That was strange, of course, but stranger still was something in the middle of the stream that spun round and round at a tremendous rate.

It was their old acquaintance, the Pink Star, that had succeeded in getting only half-way across. But the stream was narrow, and by standing in the water Diddy reached the Star, and a push sent it all the way across.

Diddy waded to the other side, while Dedder followed carrying the If on his shoulder. The Pink Star shook its points until they were dry again, and, rising in the air, sailed

HAPPY though vacation days may be, there is a certain feeling of enjoyment in returning to the trend of things at home, to slide back pleasantly into old habits, and to rest once more in accustomed places. In the matter of the toilette at any rate, it is always to me a satisfaction to arrive once more to things in their proper places, the light just where I want it, and to my own particular—and to me, precious,—way of performing this interesting part of the day's duties. They say it is a sure sign of approaching old age to resent change, but little as I like to acknowledge this allegation I must still be honest and admit that I prefer my own, worn-in-the-groove way of doing things.

You, dear ladies, who have been holidaying, too, no doubt will agree with me that you enjoy your own dressing table more than that provided by the management of any summer hotel, no matter how palatial it may be. Just at first the flaw in the mirror is all a part of the vacation idea; the fact that four times out of five there is no hot water for your bath, does not seem so discouraging for the first few weeks, neither are you greatly dismayed when nothing but a rusty stream can be induced to flow into your tub. These are all trivial matters compared to the great fact that you are away from the rush and hurry of city life, that the air which you are breathing is filled with the pure fragrance of pine, that you have only to listen to hear the lap-splash of waves upon a sandy shore. This, I say, is the manner in which we argue for the first few weeks of our holidaying.

A DAINTY CHAPEAU

On the other hand, you may be the guest of friends at their shore or country home. The place is beautiful and everything that is hospitable may be done for your comfort. However, here again, well-established duties of the toilette must be abandoned. You desist from putting the accustomed coating of cold cream on your face at night, and from covering your nose with a pore ointment that gives you a white and funny appearance, because in such war paint you hesitate to meet the searching eye of the little maid who taps upon the door at seven to serve your morning tea. Later you rush through your dressing in fear of the summoning bell for breakfast (a perfect guest is never late!) and hair and complexion suffer in consequence. That begins the day badly—all your old habits are upset, and you have an irritated feeling of looking anything but your best.

The same and many more similar inconveniences occur no matter where we may be, in camp, in our own summer cottage, a guest at a hotel or a visitor in a country home. As I said before, it is all a part of the holiday fun for the first fortnight or so, but at the end of the season there are few among us who are not happy and satisfied to return to home and the old habits. Haven't you found it so?

HAVE any of you, I wonder, seen the charming little perfume lamps which are becoming so popular for use in the boudoir? I came across one the other day, which had been brought from New York. It was just the size of a small rose jar and was of beautifully decorated china in a flower design. The stopper is removed and a tiny electric bulb inserted into the jar which is filled with the particular perfume which one affects, with the result that when the current is turned on, the most delicious fragrance fills the room. It is a fascinating conceit and will be welcomed by those of us who love to surround ourselves with vanities.

CORRESPONDENCE

ELEANOR.—You are doing a very unwise thing, Miss Eleanor, in washing your golden brown hair every week. No wonder it is oily—the very thing you are doing is causing that condition. Washing may dry up the oil for a brief period of time, but such constant washing simply creates a greater flow. It is evident that your hair needs a tonic—one that should be rubbed in every night when preparing the hair before sleeping. The formula for this I shall send you in my private reply. Also, I beseech you, use no soap for shampooing other than a pure Castile, and be sure that it is pure. Such soap may be difficult to find these days. I had some difficulty just this summer in obtaining a supply for myself, and after inquiring for it at a dozen or more city stores I happened upon some old stock of it in a little country shop that kept everything from a plough to a Gainsborough hat! It was quite discolored on the outside but white and fresh when you cut it and was of real Castile production. As to the enlarged pores that are troubling you, alternate use of hot and cold water is not of much use without the use of an astringent. I shall send you the name of one which I feel I can recommend.

C. S. S.—I am sending you the name of a henna preparation for the hair which is quite the best of its kind, if you feel that you must use it. It includes soap for a shampoo and powder for rinsing. Be careful about following the instructions; I have heard of rather startling results from carelessness.

The Business Man

As Sometimes Seen by The Business Woman

By A. H. HERBERT

[This article is written by a woman who has had some years' experience of business life. Her views will probably not meet with general acceptance and we shall be glad to hear from our readers on this very live topic—both from those who agree and those who disagree with the writer.—Editor's Note.]

WE have had innumerable articles, speeches and dissertations on the characteristics and qualifications requisite for a business woman. Of course the entry of woman into commercial and professional life in the last thirty years has undoubtedly violated the fixed laws of a thousand climes and countries, and long centuries of time. So perhaps it is not surprising that men in business and men in journalism find the new era seriously disturbing, and waste endless reams of advice and precept upon the hapless victims of an absurd ambition.

Woman can now earn her living and need not marry for a home; that is the real vital principle of the great emancipation. If love passes her by, it is not now necessary to sell body and soul to the best advantage, or sink into the ignominy of an oft-times starved and despised old age. But she has at one bound escaped from the thralldom of domestic bondage, only to emerge beneath the shifting tyranny of the masculine commercial autocrat. Consequently following close upon the entry of woman into all departments of wage-earning, we have the sudden and curious development of the suffragette.

It is extraordinary how vast a majority of mankind do hold that "woman is undeveloped man," but so long as she remained man's wife or sister, woman did not realize the attitude. As soon as she entered the business world she became aware of a slow deadly daily pressure forcing her to understand and appreciate the rigid masculine estimate of her inferiority. So long as she adorned his drawing-room, mothered his children, darned and washed his socks, or gave cheap service at the tasks too full of drudgery for the lords of creation, such as extra salesgirl at the shop counter, patient slave at the telephone board or steady toiler as a factory hand, man was willing to lavish gifts upon or marry her with such deference and generosity of manner as seemed a concession to her superiority. As long as he held the role of My Lord Patron he could be magnanimous to a fault, but once the honors were divided it became necessary for him to withdraw the courtesy hitherto accorded the inferior because the inferior became so impudently outrageous as to claim equality.

Now I believe that just this very attitude of man is responsible for the female genius called suffragette, and by suffragette—I mean SUFFRAGETTE—not just a woman who wants a vote. For strange to say the vast majority of men favor votes for women, in a subtle way fully understanding it might really enhance their own opportunity were it not for the suffragette. But down in his soul he realizes that the suffragette has penetrated the sophistry of his chivalry, fully appreciates his contemptuous rating of her sex, and intends to advertise and expose his hypocrisy and his unjust and jealous treatment of womankind in the industrial marts of the world.

THE situation is a perfectly normal and natural one. The woman who has gone to work has unveiled the reality behind the pretence, and the discovery has stung her to animosity. Man knows that he has been found out, and is correspondingly nasty. For centuries, so far as the material world is concerned, woman has been entirely at the mercy of man, and she is very largely at his mercy yet. And it is this material tyranny of the business man that creates and multiplies suffragettes. Of course business men are just as fine husbands and good fathers and splendid sons and brothers as they ever were. But outside their little home circle of exceptions they are more or less committed to the feud between the sexes. It may be that man's unshakable chivalry in compliance with the ancient custom of the ages decrees that woman should be protected by the shelter of home, but he fails to realize that a woman sometimes is forced to give her soul as the price of that shelter and the degradation to herself far transcends the physical hardships of laboring as a free woman for her daily bread.

Outside the realm of gentlemen, and they are a minor handful of masculines in any sphere of life, the business man is more or less deeply bitten by antipathy to feminine employees. Even in cases where he clamors for their cheaper and more satisfactory services he is unjustly critical and hostile in his attitude. Watch carefully and you will find that few men entertain the same tolerant leniency to the mistakes of a female as a male clerk. If a boy or man makes a mistake it is pre-eminently his masculine prerogative, if a girl blunders it comes of inherent disability and is duly reprimanded, referred to and magnified as an unerring signification of her inefficiency. Of course if she has dropped into the easy chummy intimacy with men that is required she will be graciously dealt with, not as a matter of justice but as a special personal favor.

It is useless to gloss over the matter. Where there are four men anxious and eager to smooth the path for the woman who wants to keep her soul, there are twenty who constitute themselves special constables to spy upon her work and her person and peddle detestable derogatory criticisms far and wide through her business domain. Sooner or later every woman who earns her bread is forced to confront this biting narrow injustice, and sooner or later if she possesses normal strength of character she will be roused to resentment as she comprehends the breadth and depth of masculine business snobbery. For many years man's pocket has been the financial repository of household funds, and this very control of the family purse has been the rock upon which so many homes have been wrecked. The reason for this arrangement, of course, is that man earns the money, woman only spends it. And if you make a close study of the business man's attitude to-day to the business woman you will quickly realize how jealously he hugs his badges of superiority, the right to criticize and indulge in familiarities with all female labor, and the privilege of handing her out her wages.

The persistent, supercilious proffering of advice to all women by man is the funniest side of the masculine composition. In business technicalities women have a lot to learn, but strange to say that phase of their ignorance never enters into the text of their advising critics. But they are continually being reprimanded in newspapers and public speeches for their lack of punctuality, their unsuitable dress, their lack of method, their dragging in of personalities, their want of business dignity and reserve. That is always the gist of their arraignment. Rarely or never do you find them berated for their ignorance of international exchange, banking procedure, legal proceedings in real estate transfers, nor the conditions and laws governing the stock market.

STRANGER still there is a protest against these criticisms by only half the women at work. It may be they are so glad to be independent that the verbal injustice of man passes them by as a negligible folly. It may be that many women have a sense of humor and likewise deem it wise to let sleeping dogs lie; or it may be the century-old habit of abiding by man's dictum in the business world still enthalls them, and they have come to accept the charges against their inadequacy simply because these charges are man-made.

To say that man is over-critical of the woman wage earner is to run the risk of infuriated protest. But as an old science master at school used to say, "it is the dog that's hit yelps."

One-Cent Dish

Remember this whenever you think of food cost.

Quaker Oats form the supreme food. Pound for pound, they supply twice the calories of round steak, and nearly three times eggs.

They are almost the ideal food in balance and completeness. Oat eaters are well fed. Yet the cost is but one cent per dish.

8 to 12 times as much

8 times the cost of the oat dish

Costs 12 times a dish of Quaker Oats

Costs 10 times Quaker Oats

Fish is 8 times as expensive

Cuts breakfast costs 85%

A Quaker Oats breakfast costs about one-ninth what meat, eggs or fish would cost. As a food it far excels them all.

The average family saves about 35c in serving oats in place of meat foods. And that helps pay for costlier foods at dinner.

Measure foods by calories of nutriment. Note the difference in cost, as per table below, based on prices at this writing.

And one could prove the charge from the experience of every woman who earns her bread. I know a case in point where for several years a university graduate, clever, capable, orderly and dignified, filled a responsible professional post. Previously it had been held by a man. She gave excellent courteous service, but absolutely refused to countenance familiarities and vulgarities in the men with whom she did business. Consequently she was deferentially treated, deeply respected, and subjected to a daily and weekly persecution of childish and petty criticisms, of idiotic and ridiculous espionage. Having a cool head and a high ambition, her temper never once recognized the undercurrent animosity nor swerved in unruffled serenity. Then a man took her place. He was illiterate, ill-bred, untidy and incompetent, irresponsible, slipshod and unreliable, yet he was received with cordial eagerness. The rawest girl graduate from a business college would have known more about the work than he did, for he could neither write properly nor reason, and his attempts at the problems in hand were ridiculous in the extreme, but he possessed unlimited cheek and colossal conceit and from the hour of his inauguration became persona grata with the men whom he was incapable of serving.

Lack of punctuality and promptness is one of the outstanding counts against woman workers. Yet after the most careful investigation the charge cannot be substantiated. Of course it is a very ancient joke that man is always kept late for social engagements because it takes his feminine companion so long to dress. In the same way mothers-in-law and "old maids who have never given up hope," have been the butt of the male writers' contributions to the funny columns of journalism for generations. But because man has seen fit to be rather vulgar in his quips about women does not prove that his individual venom should be accepted as a bona fide report on all womanhood. Set hours, punctuality and orderliness are esteemed the inseparable requirements of business life. But when girls come out of the same homes as boys, and are disciplined at the same public schools, when for centuries the peace of thousands of homes has depended on the promptness with which the husband's meals are served, it is scarcely rational to maintain that a woman does not understand punctuality. That she is less conscientious than man in applying her knowledge would hardly be considered seriously. In big concerns she usually pays for her lateness in cash. And as a delinquent her percentage is as small as her male confreres, but there is no question but that her delinquencies are much more fully and persistently advertised. But to insist that she is constitutionally unable to realize the importance of punctuality as man does is the silliest nonsense. An age long devotion to housekeeping is the most exacting teacher of punctuality, energy and thoughtfulness.

WOMAN and her foolish devotion to dress and fashion has rendered man a never failing source of cynical amusement throughout the world. And one wonders why she has never retaliated in kind. I have seen a reputedly faultless business man keep several ladies waiting fifteen and twenty minutes whilst he indulged a prolonged and minute toilet of hairbrushing and tie fixing in preparation for church, and he was a married man of many years standing. I have seen a busy city Doctor keep a lady waiting for ages whilst his housekeeper brushed his immaculate blacks just after his return from church on a fine dustless day, merely because he deemed his caller a socially nice person, nothing more. And it would be unwise to stir up a discussion about the amount of money men spend on their barber, tailor, hatmaker, haberdasher and laundress. Nobody ever seems to consider how seldom a man washes, dawns or makes his own clothes, nor how universally woman attends to her own wardrobe.

Of course, too, girls in business dress unsuitably, high heels, exposed throats, thin blouses and elaborate ornaments. Quite often they do—but how scathingly do the male staff report and jeer at the low heel, the durable dress, the serviceable color and plain cut!

Does nobody ever think of the doctor, lawyer and merchant who run about in trousers and braces, who persistently work without their coats, who hoist their feet on their office tables and who neglect to air their clothes and cleanse their persons? What reams the working girl could tell of the unshaven employer, the man reeking of stale tobacco, the persistent smoking in business hours, the recurrent expressions of rough slang, oft-times profanity, the

The Future of the I.O.D.E.

By JEAN GRAHAM

DURING the past winter several articles have appeared in this journal concerning the work of the I.O.D.E., which, as every Canadian woman knows, are the initials for the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire. One of these was concerned with the philanthropic work of the Order and inadvertently aroused the ire of a Hamilton woman journalist by failing to mention the work done by the chapters in that City of Ambition and Achievement. No protest came from the Hamilton Daughters, who are well aware that the writer of this article has dealt more than once with the work so successfully and harmoniously carried out by the Chapters in Hamilton. It may be remarked, with due regard for geographical facts, that Canada is a large country and that it was impossible to mention specifically the work of a philanthropic nature undertaken in each city and town in the fight against tuberculosis—and the Hamilton campaign had been so frequently mentioned that it seemed as if it must be familiar to all. The London work was not mentioned—neither was Winnipeg—nor was there re-ordered the splendid work in Saskatchewan. It could not be done—within the limits of that article.

Now that (I hope) it has been made clear that no affront was intended to Hamilton, a city which is dear to the heart of everyone who knows her, may I be permitted to take this Wentworth centre as a text or illustration—or whatever you will—for an article on the future of the Order? There is a wonderful spirit of co-operation in Hamilton which must be the spirit of the whole if there is to be progress in the future. Hamilton was fortunate in having for years the guidance of Mrs. P. D. Crerar as Municipal Regent—a woman whose genius for organization was equalled by her warmth of sympathy. Brilliant in intellect, loyal to friend and church and country, the memory of Marion Crerar, whose life was shortened by her untiring devotion to the cause in which she fought as truly as her three soldier sons, will long remain an inspiration to all who knew her. It was fitting, then, that when there was formed an Ontario organization of the I.O.D.E., Mrs. Burkholder of Hamilton should be chosen president of the Provincial Chapter.

It is inevitable that an Order so large as the I.O.D.E., stretching in Canada over nine provinces and including a vast variety in its membership, should know its brisk and even breezy discussions and that differences of opinion should mean more or less publicity. Have you ever noticed that a meeting may run along smoothly and have fifty-nine minutes of amiable conference and receive little notice from the press; but if there is one moment of frank disagreement, the world is likely to be informed of the matter? Wherefore, since the last three annual meetings have had more than their share of animated debate, the newspapers have sometimes given the impression that the proportion of disagreement was much greater than was actually the case. The members of the I.O.D.E., are sincerely and sanely patriotic in their aims, and the Order, with its sturdy past of service and achievement, has now to face new conditions and demands. It is more important than ever before that there be union in matters essential and that there be a realization of the after-the-war needs.

Let us admit that we all feel "let down," after the extraordinary strain and suspense of the war years. Bewilderment is undoubtedly the mental condition of most of us, as we consider the world story since 1914 and wonder what the next decade will bring to Canada. Here, the value of organization should be made evident when our after-the-war tasks are to be undertaken—and the I.O.D.E. can do a wonderful work in helping and stimulating wherever women are working together.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the sole condition for membership is British citizenship and a desire to work for the good of the Empire—that being construed in the broadest interpretation of the phrase. There is a membership representing every creed and class—and such is the only condition on which an Imperial Order can be surely founded. Any attempt at church or political supremacy within the organization would be fatal to its success—and no such attempt at control has been made. Most of the members belong to church and philanthropic organizations—but the I.O.D.E. is the common meeting-ground, where the bond is that of country and service to that Dominion and the Empire to which it belongs. We have referred before to that false sentiment, commonly known as "funkeyism," which is confused by some superficial observers with the true imperialism. Even at the risk of repetition, let us say with emphasis that the British imperial idea means unity and service. When we think of the far-flung posts of the Empire and recall the courage and fortitude of the men and women who held them, we realize that there is a sense of obligation, rather than a sentiment of pride, to be associated with that oft-abused word, "imperialism." There have been vain and self-seeking citizens who have made the word an excuse for personal advancement and aggrandizement—but such persons are found under every government on which the sun rises—and, if we were to visit the planet Mars, we should probably find the tuft-hunters occupying a more-or-less conspicuous position.

It is because this word of fine origin and noble significance has been so often misused, that the I.O.D.E. now has a unique opportunity to show its true value. There are many Canadians, not of British birth, to whom "empire" means tyranny and oppression of all individual ambition. Is it any wonder that whole communities which have experienced the degradation of a government, iron-clad in its caste system, should

PRESIDENT OF THE I.O.D.E.

Miss Joan Arnoldi, elected President of the I.O.D.E. at the recent annual meeting in Calgary, went overseas with Miss Mary Plummer. They were among the earliest Canadian war workers in England, for they were appointed officers in charge of the Canadian Field Comforts Commission, for sending comforts to the soldiers, the very month after war was declared. They went over with the First Contingent of deathless memory, and were at Salisbury Plain till March, 1915, when they were moved, first to Ashford, and later to Shorncliffe.

"Please Excuse My Back" $5

HOW frequently one has heard the trite expression, "Please excuse my back," and how frequently one has answered with equal triteness, "Don't mention it! The back's the best part of a goose!" Surely "Please excuse my back" should be worked overtime these days, and I think the retort courteous has never been so apt, so appropriate. For when has the human back been the subject of so much controversy, and is not the girl or the woman who wears one of the fashionable backless gowns most fittingly described as a goose? Should she not be in a constant state of apology?

Recently I saw in one of our best magazines an advertisement for a certain kind of ivory toilet article. A young girl with a sweet, innocent expression on her pretty face gazed enraptured at a box containing brush, comb, etc., which she held in her hands. She was gowned in a shade between rose and scarlet, and her back was turned to the gaze of the spectator. The picture might have been entitled "Please excuse my back," or "The Scarlet Woman" would perhaps have served equally well. But she had a beautiful back—there is no denying that fact. It was soft, white, just plump enough—and how few, how woefully few such backs one sees in these days of backless evening gowns!

I could write a whole chapter on "Backs that I have seen." There is the fat, bulging back; the thin back, where, if one were a devout Catholic, one could tell one's beads on the little humps of the spine, a sort of human rosary, as it were.

At a dance given a week or so ago my partner and I were promenading before the encore. Directly in front of us, also promenading, was a girl with her partner. The former, a very pretty young debutante, was gowned in an exquisite creation, except for the fact that it was backless. My partner turned to me. "I didn't know until to-night that Peggy is deformed," he said. Neither had I known. She has a slight, a very slight curvature of the spine. In an ordinary decollete gown it would have passed unnoticed, but in her extraordinary backless affair, the poor, pitiful little deformity was revealed to everyone.

"Why?" and again "Why?" you ask. You might as well question the Sphinx. There is no answer.

"We don't have to wear gloves to the dances any more," said the young brother of a friend of mine the other day.

"Yes, you do, Jack," contradicted his sister. "Why not?"

"Well, the girls can wash their backs now," answered the youth nonchalantly.

What would ever have happened if one of these girls had appeared in a drawing-room in our mother's or grandmother's day? Can't you see some woman with presence of mind quickly throwing her silk shawl around "the creature" and hurrying her from the room? Can't you see the blushes and embarrassment of the women forced to remain?

FROM the subject of backless gowns to that of women smoking seems only a step. I'm not one of those narrow-minded people who believe that because a girl smokes cigarettes in this world she will smoke (but not cigarettes) in the next. Nor am I one of those women who tried to keep our soldiers from having their tobacco and cigarettes to help them bear the terrible discomforts of the trenches, to say nothing of their pain and suffering. I like to see a man enjoy his pipe or cigarette, provided he doesn't make a chimney of himself. But I must confess I don't like to see the girls enjoy their cigarettes! Who ever heard of a girl making sachet-bags of tobacco and placing them among her lingerie and other belongings? Yet it would be just as sensible as constantly perfuming her breath with cigarettes.

Recently I was visiting a friend who smokes a great deal too much. She has a dear wee sprite, a golden-haired, blue-eyed girl, and I often thought how the memory of her mother's good-night kiss would be associated always in the child's mind with the smell of tobacco.

It is so unromantic. One reads of "the fragrance of her tresses," the delicate, subtle fragrance of violet, off lilac, but—tobacco!

THERE is a natural association between tea and talk, which every woman knows. Our clubs and our societies, even in the churches, may go heavily and unbrightened until there is a clink of cups and spoons, when everyone revives, and Mrs. A—is moved to confide in Mrs. B—that the trimming of silk braid which the former is wearing on her blue serge gown was bought before 1914, and is therefore much to be preferred to any of the shockingly poor material you can get now. Yes, tea is a loosener of tongues and an opener of hearts, and it is to be hoped that it will continue to have an honored place in the rites of the home or the club. There is a corner in the JOURNAL, therefore, where we may “just talk,” that is not intended for any particular information or instruction, but merely what the heading (and don't you think it is a pretty one?) tells us—teacup time. Of course, someone will say that it is going to be “gossipy”—and perhaps the someone will be right.

Have you noticed, though, that gossip, in the mean sense of that word, is not so common as it used to be? The small affairs of our neighbors do not concern us as they once did—and we do not waste time in wondering how Mr. Goldbrick got his money, and whether Mrs. Goldbrick is going to wear her fur coat another winter. The contact with world affairs which the war brought to us has made us aware of wider interests than the town or the county in which we live—and the world needs were never more insistent than they are to-day.

Just here someone may say indignantly: “What do you mean, Anne Willow, by suggesting that teacups and gossip have anything to do with each other? Women don't gossip—at least, not a bit more than the men.” That is quite true, my new friend—and do let me give you a lump of sugar in your tea.

SPEAKING of sugar, however, isn't it a sinful price — and aren't those dusky Cubans coining money, while Canadian housewives wonder where the next jam and preserves will come from? We know that there has been a vast amount of profiteering, and that the poor consumer is having the hard time of it—literally bitter in these trying days; but it is so hard to find just where the trouble lies and what is the address of the arch-profitteer. Perhaps we have eaten more sugar than we should, in the sweetened days that have gone by, but we know that a sugarless existence would be almost as depressing as a saltless salad.

There is one thing of which we are assured, that life is not going to be dull. It may be hard and exacting, but it will not be without its changes. Some of us long for the good old days before we knew about Germany's “kultur” and the ways of the Bolshevik; but the before-the-war security will not come back. While we all wish fervently for all wars, civil and international, to be banished from the Earth, it is not to be denied that part of our restlessness comes from the “looking for trouble” attitude which the tremendous sensations of the war gave us. Even in the smaller things of life, uncertainty is not always unwelcome. And here let me quote a delightful poem, “Dream Ships,” by F. C. Palmer, which I found in the “Spectator”:

“If every night at six o'clock,
As punctual as the postman's knock,
Our dream-ships from the dreamland seas
Sailed back upon a homeward breeze,
Bearing piled high in every hold
The treasures that our dreams foretold,
Books and soldiers, dolls and guns,
And chocolates and currant buns,
How happy would be every face;
This world would seem a different place.
And yet if laden stern to stern,
They never failed at six p.m.
To wander back to me and you,
And each and every wish came true,
And ne'er a vessel came to harm,
The thing in time would lose its charm,
And wonder, light and glad surprise
Would fade away from children's eyes,
And we might even sit and long
For something awful to go wrong,

If every night at six o'clock
Those dream-ships all sailed back to dock.”

AMIDST all the chances and changes of securing a habitation after the years of unsettlement, it is pleasant to hear of those who have found just what they like—round pegs which have slipped easily and securely into round holes. There was a bright-faced English girl who came out to Canada for two years during the war and found congenial employment teaching what she most liked. Then the war was over, and a certain young Englishman who had fought for many weary months found time to think of more pleasant things and came to Canada, where, in a pretty church in a northern city, there was a quiet wedding and a honeymoon journey of the old-fashioned kind. New York and the West Indies were the scenes of “a home for a week end or so,” and then their Canadian friends lost sight of the happy couple. Now they have been writing once more—and what do you think they have decided to do? They have taken an old farm near Brighton in England, and are real back-to-the-landers, going to learn all about the modern methods of cultivating the soil and looking after the hens.

It is a farm which is of the small but historic variety, and the house thereon is hundreds of years old. The bride is wisely avoiding the modern style of furniture, and is obtaining from an antiquarian friend all the suitable old chairs, tables and settees which post-war finances will permit. It is going to be the most lovable old farm-house when it is all dressed in its antique garb—and there are going to be roses and pansies and snap dragon—and I'm going over there to call next summer or the year after—or sometime before 1930.

THERE is a kind of propaganda going about our country now which reads so smoothly and so plausibly that, at first, we do not realize its source or its meaning. It assures us that war is a horrible thing (as if we were unaware of its practical realization), and that peace is the one desirable condition. Then we are informed that it is the privilege (nay, the duty) of women to encourage peace and to cultivate international friendship. This sounds very well, and the guileless citizen thinks how noble are the men and women who are announcing such views. Then there is a plea of “Canada for the Canadians” (whatever that may mean) and some pleasant talk about developing our own resources, looking after our own communities and being splendidly and aggressively Canadian. What does it all mean? Some of it undoubtedly implies that those who were unannounced friends of the Huns and who were pacifists during the war are seeking to make us anxious to buy German goods once more.

As for the “Canada for Canadians” cry, it has not been explained to us in any satisfactory way. When the French arrived in this country, the Algonquins, the Iroquois and other stalwart tribes were the Canadians. When the English (not to mention the Scotch and the Irish) arrived on the scene there was eventually a struggle for the land, and an entirely new “Canadianism” began. The other day, I heard a pretty little Roumanian (born in Montreal) announce herself as a “Canadian—sure!” It would be interesting to inquire: “What is a Canadian?” Those of English, Irish or Scotch descent have been accustomed to consider themselves the true Canadians, while the descendants of the French settlers, in their old farms near the Ancient Capital, are really Canadians of more settled standing.

We need a robust, patriotic spirit—but we cannot, dare not cultivate an aloofness from international affairs. When circulars regarding this peace propaganda and this latest thing in Canadianism are sent to us, let us ask ourselves—and others—the question: Is there an unwritten invitation to German trade in these paragraphs? Is there a secret hostility to British connection in these plausible appeals? Does “Canada for the Canadians” mean an attempt at separation from the League of Nations forming the British Empire?

Vanda of the Latin Quarter

A Story of Love and Art
Under the Shadow of War

By BILLEE GLYNN

Paid for in advance

AMIDST the clamor of the crowd, the sway of military music, the click of feet and the clang of accoutrement, the careering Gallic cheers, the flashing joy and panting enthusiasm alone possible in Paris—crushed and jolted out of breath, and with white, tense face lifted to the serried, cheerful profiles of the marching soldiers, Vanda Carnot edged onward. Even in that crowd of contrast, color, and intensity, in that turmoil which filled the sky, she was noticeable. The slope of her shoulders was lyric, a line of poignant allure; the elegance of her figure, betraying itself in glimpses, and simply garbed, was something to make the looker pause even in such madness. To real beauty there is always that veiled wonder of spring which stops one in the greatest storm. Her evident anxiety betokened only the deeper beating of her heart—like one of those cold winds that shake a wild flower. She forced her way onward with difficulty.

At the corner of the Chaussee d'Antin a tall, mustached American sculptor, about thirty, catching sight of her, plucked the sleeve of his companion.

"It's Vanda," he whispered, "the famous model of the Quartier. She married Paul Carnot, whose picture was given first honors at the Louvre and was the talk of Paris two years ago. He went to the war. I wonder if he has returned? Perhaps his regiment is among these. She appears to be looking for him. Their marriage was one of the romances of Paris."

The young Italian to whom this speech was addressed raised his hands with that inimitable gesture of the Latin denoting the divinity of beauty and its worship. "J'en suis ravi, J'en suis ravi," he breathed transcendently. "To see her is to know that God is the one great artist."

It took Vanda more than an hour to reach the caserne where Paul's regiment would disband. By this time her heart was beating frightfully and her limbs trembled under her. She had seen his regiment pass, but had not recognized him among them. With the breath tight in her throat she had tried to keep up with it, but found it impossible owing to the denseness of the crowd. She had a ghastly feeling that he must be dead. The thought hammered on her intelligence till she felt sick and faint. At the Gare de l'Est, where the statue of Strasbourg stood resplendent with wreaths, she had been disappointed first. After, it seemed, having waited for hours, she had been swept back and out of range in the rush of the immense crowd as the train arrived. But she had raised herself to her utmost height and watched the bedraggled uniforms emerge quickly and form while the bands played a thrilling welcome and the people broke wildly the restraint of months. And all about her had been the sound of laughter and sudden weeping, the convulsive embrace, the shouted greeting, the happy gesture of recognition—but for her there had been nothing—nothing at all.

At the caserne she waited in front of the main entrance with other women. They spoke of sweethearts, husbands, brothers and sons. But Vanda stood silent and a little apart, the terrible strain in her face increasing.

THEN a touch on her arm, and he stood looking down on her. Grand Dieu! She put her hands to her eyes. She could scarcely recognize him, his face was so scarred. And one eye was gone. It was horrible, horrible. So much so that she shrank instinctively while his other eye smiled down on her. And then she fell forward, sobbing, into his arms with the gladness of having him.

She raised her head in a moment and stood proudly. The throng had broken into the cry, "Vive la France! Vive la France!" and a block away a band had struck up "La Marseillaise." A small party of the One Hundred and Forty-Ninth issuing from the caserne took up the cry. Then they spied Paul Carnot and his companion and raced toward them, dancing in a ring around them while they voiced loudly: "Le Sauveur de son regiment, le sauveur de son regiment!" A dozen mouths supplementing each other poured out the story to Vanda, and she listened with the wild color stinging her cheeks and her eyes beaming a softness close to tears. Paul, her Paul, a hero! And she had not known it, not a word of it, till now. Few seemed to have known it, indeed, but his corps. When his regiment would surely have been cut to pieces it was he, the artist, who had saved their retreat. A plain infantryman, he had taken a deserted gun and destroyed a pontoon upon which the enemy were crossing in great numbers. Hundreds of them had been killed and as many wounded and drowned. His own regiment and supporting troops could then retreat in good order. They carried him with them covered with glory and wounds. One eye was gone, the sight in the other impaired. He had been in the hospital at Havre. But he had got out in time to join his regiment on the way to Paris.

For a considerable time the artist and the beautiful girl on his arm were the centre of an admiring, hand-shaking crowd eager to voice its congratulations. Then with Sergeant Beranger, who was a celebrated journalist and an old friend, they set out gayly.

Paul Carnot had been a well-known figure in Paris. Every half block he was stopped by someone who had revered him as an artist and who held up his hands at the sight of his wounds and glowed over his medaille militaire. The flush of patriotism and the glory of France were in the air, the honor in arms and the gratification of the new peace. The heart swam in it, it seemed, forgetting everything else. The real sense of tragedy belongs to the impotence of its pause.

At length they reached the studio in the rue de la Tour des Dames. Sergeant Beranger had accepted their invitation to dine, and Vanda proceeded to prepare the meal herself.

How many joyous dinners they had had there before! What discussions and dreams! Litterateurs, bon viveurs, and artists of all characters and degrees had spoken their minds in this sanctum. Scarcely a dreamer in Paris but had smoked his cigarette here. For Paul Carnot stood at the head of that younger set of artists whose ideals were thrusting themselves like young flowers above the long frost of convention in art. His winning first honors at the Louvre had been recognition of this in the highest quarters. When the war broke out he stood at the April of his career.

They talked of art now while they ate dinner, with the gathering twilight at the window and in the soft glow of one big, shaded lamp. And Vanda with her golden hair was like a star in it all, one of those bright objects of Heaven that keep aspiration alive in the world.

AFTER the meal was over she brought to Paul the canvas upon which he had last worked before the war started—a picture of the genius of music evolving from a marvelous purple background. It was full of subtle tones and was but half finished. Upon inspecting the painting Beranger became enthusiastic, praising it in sparkling journalistic terms. Above everything else he ardently repeated: "Quand finira-t-elle, quand finira-t-elle!" (When will it be finished?)

And Paul Carnot, who had drunk freely, was completely carried along, forgetting that the picture could never be finished, or any other, because of his eyes. Only Vanda, her heart trembling like an autumn leaf, remembered—remembered, it seemed, in a sweeping tragic instant. The great gladness of having him had all at once dropped to this. And in the dark corner of the room, as she put away the canvas, her smile died as a dove dies in a flickering, pitiless moment.

Health And The Home

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN is to contribute to our October issue the first article in a department which, we assure you, is to be of vital interest to every reader of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. The writer of the department is qualified, by many years of professional experience, to write on all topics which mean the welfare of the home. Read the first article and you will be sure to read all following contributions by the FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

But she could not, she must not, spoil his home-coming. Even a sob might plunge him into his years of torture. Of all the beings in the world she knew that an artist could suffer most. It was the awfulness of this fact, not that she must suffer with him. She must do something to fight the grip of the Thing. Sinking down on the piano stool, she played "La Marseillaise." It served slightly to control her.

With the first notes of the anthem the men had risen to their feet. In the pause which followed Beranger took out his watch and excused himself to keep an appointment. They bade him good-night at the door together. Then Carnot drew her in, kissing her. She returned to the piano and he asked that he might lie down while he listened.

It was the anthology of her life that she seemed to play so tenderly. The deep, sweet call of spring, the odorous blossoms and sighing, scented winds and shaping harmony. The beating of a heart, the birth of passion. The universe caught in the pure quality of the lyric. The height of dreaming and the elegie, that marvelous heart wall of Massenet. Through a dozen varying moods, improvisations and compositions she ran. Then her fingers rested idly on the keys.

"That was beautiful, Vanda," said Paul behind her. "Will you play me a lullaby, dear; I feel that I may sleep."

She did so, repeating it over and over—a lullaby like the drift of violets on a hillside and full of the velvet wistfulness of twilight.

She ceased only when she knew by his breathing that he slept. She stepped over and kneeling down kissed tenderly his poor, scarred face and his eyes. What a gift God had given him, and a German shell had shot it away. German or French, British or Russian—what difference! It was the needless, pitiless, hellish sacrifice of it, the century, world-heaping wrong!

With her hands clasped on the window-sill, she looked over the roofs of Paris. Perhaps a million tragedies unfolded there that night. All over Europe it was the same. A year ago and it had been so much happiness! Now he whose creed was beauty lay a wreck behind her. Never would another dawn bring him anything. He, the master of painters, would never paint again. His artist soul would die an hour at a time, day after day, and all for what?

Over the dry, hot rims of her eyes the tears burst in a silent shower beyond repressing. She flung herself back to the dark corner of the room and the canvas at which she had looked so often and so lovingly during his absence. With it clasped to her heart, she sank there weeping, her head buried in the cushions of a divan to still the sobs that shook her body. She must weep to-night, for she must smile to-morrow. Through ten thousand to-morrows she would smile for his sake—he, for whom every to-morrow would be born dead.

"Please Excuse My Back"

Suppose in the beautiful pictures or exquisite statues of Joan of Arc, she should be depicted with a cigarette in her mouth. Would not the Maid of Orleans cease to be the ideal of all that is noble, brave and chivalrous in womanhood? Or take "Elaine the fair, Elaine the lovable, Elaine the lily maid of Astolat." Picture her smoking a cigarette while guarding the sacred shield of her beloved Lancelot. In some way do not her loveliness, her devotion, seem rapidly to dissolve into thin air?

"AND now, thirdly," for surely if I am preaching I should be allowed at least a thirdly. I am going to have a little bit to say about women playing bridge for points.

"Oh, yes," I hear some reader say. "I'll wager she can't play anything but 'Old Maid.'" Well, I'm going to be rude enough to contradict her. I do play bridge, and I love it, but I don't play for points. Most of my friends do, and in consequence I see less of them. I know a woman, a plain woman, who used to be bright, interesting, fun-loving, and therefore popular. Then came bridge and the subsequent playing for points. To-day that woman is a different creature. She loses steadily, and she cannot afford to lose. All her friends hate to

The Press and Nation-Building

How the Publisher and Writer
May Help in the Development of a National Spirit

CANADIAN national journalism is yet in its infancy. It takes centuries to develop the genius of a people. Canada is slowly developing. Her history, while devoid of many tragic passages, yet exhibits a record of stirring growth and development which was not wrought without conflict of mind and soul, sometimes of body. It is when we come to look dinner speeches. Our new Premier goes so far as to claim for Canada nationhood within the empire. It matters not which. Her development through the long and inevitable future will be hastened or retarded according as clear, progressive and liberalizing thought is brought into play. Where so ready an organ to a growing State as a healthy, unifying, national press?

A SUCCESSFUL WRITER

Miss Frances B. Taylor, London, Ontario, won the "Manitoba Free Press" prize for the best poem on the subject of Manitoba's fiftieth anniversary. One thousand poems were submitted.

back on what was that we can venture to prophesy for the future. And one thing is evident now, in the pages of Canadian colonial history, that as in the past a liberalizing, nationalizing, unifying press was in the main absent, it must be reckoned with as one of the future agencies of nationhood.

Consider a few outstanding points. Canada has inherited her utmost boundaries, but the development of her interior is still in progress. This mere physical fact, so great in its proportions, calls for imaginative, tactful and harmonizing literary influences. This, a free press, broad in spirit and locally untrammelled, can best give. Neither the East, nor the Centre, nor the West is the voice of Canada. From these three chords must there be evolved a true harmony. That unified tone will be found to be the voice of Canada. Is it possible to think that as rapid progress can be made in Canada if only provincial voices clash in discord? It is the part of the national press to collect the claims of East and Centre and West, and so find the truth and justice of the matter.

Canada has achieved political freedom that is slowly broadening down through precedents to her final destiny. To-day one publicist declares that she is still colonial despite after-

CANADA has but one great industry, the exploitation of the land and its resources. Somewhat opposed to this, but really depending upon it, is a growing industrialism barely four decades old and great enough to have its power challenged by the agricultural class. The line of cleavage between shop and farm has been felt socially in the past, yet now it bids fair to become an economic issue, threatening the content of the past. Where is the remedy? None may say, but a free and broad press, scanning all sides of the issue, can greatly assist.

And again, we have a neighbor, friendly yet powerfully aggressive. Against such competition on all possible lines there should be brought out in our borders such a development of economic and agrarian power as will yield the most for our citizens individually and increase our prestige nationally. Towards this powerful neighbor we must show the same aggressive yet friendly spirit of rivalry. This is part of the game of the nations. Nations, like individuals, grow in that way. We must neither despise nor become the bondslaves of our neighbors. So the cultivation of self-help and national pride of conquest is one duty to which the national press of Canada is addressing itself.

Sewing in the Schools

By EVAN ETTA

MACHINING.

IN some schools, usually in the junior classes, the sewing lesson is chiefly devoted to hand stitching. This is as it should be, for one of the aims is to train the hand to use a needle deftly, another is to make the girls familiar with the various stitches used in making up garments so that they may be able to apply them. But a course of lessons in sewing would be incomplete, if the girls were not taught how to use a sewing machine. These time savers are now found in nearly every home and a percentage of the class will doubtless know something of the way to operate one type of sewing machine.

Pins inserted to hold corner in position ready for basting

One or two machines can be made to serve a large class if at the beginning of the term all the girls have plenty of practice in running only. It is wise to permit only one girl to be at the machine as better work results from undivided attention and an on-looker causes distraction.

It is not necessary that a girl should know how to wind the bobbin and insert the shuttle and thread the needle before being allowed to machine her work. But, as soon as possible, some of the more advanced scholars should be shown how to manipulate the different parts, thus leaving the teacher more time to devote to the backward pupils.

Hints on Running the Machine.

THE children should be given plenty of practice in using the pedal with the power shut off before they actually stitch.

Lead pencil lines, creases or basting with colored thread may act as a guide to enable the children to do straight work. The pencil lines, of course, are hidden when the work is finished. A piece of waste material may be given to children to practice on first, as this gives them confidence.

The teacher should demonstrate that the children must only use their hands to guide the work instead of pulling the work through.

Leave a good length of thread at the commencement and the end of the work for fastening off. Only tie these ends when the knot thus made will be covered over when the work is completed.

Begin at the beginning and go to the end of the work so as to save odd pieces being sewn by hand.

To help the children, the teacher or another child may turn the balance wheel to begin the work. To ensure that the end comes just where desired, stop using the foot near the end of the work and do the last few stitches by simply turning the balance wheel instead of using the foot.

When the children are efficient in actual stitching and can use a machine correctly, they should be allowed to wind the bobbin, regulate the stitch, and put in the shuttle, especially being shown how to get the thread from the shuttle when it breaks.

Before machining, the work should be basted and knots should not be used if they are in the way. Small basting stitches should be used at curves or corners. (A knot in the basting very often will break the machine needle.)

Fixing Work—Hints.

FIXING work ready for hand or machine stitching, is an important part in making up a garment. In schools this should be the work of the girls themselves, even if it is

Little Frocks

Soiled in no Time---
Can be Washed just as Quick

TINY rompers of pink and blue, Mistress Betty's cunning little smocks and underthings—all are treated with a fine disregard by little people who love to play with all their might.

But Mother-Who-Is-Wise views the rumpled mussed clothes with unruffled calm. Into the shiny copper tub of her 1900 Cataract Electric Washer she pops them, and turns on the electric current. Back and forth smoothly rocks the tub, swishing the warm soapy water through the clothes in a Figure "8" motion—that famous, exclusive movement which makes the 1900 Cataract superior to any other washing machine.

No parts in that gleaming copper tub to rub against the tiny underthings. Nothing to wrench off buttons, or tear the finest Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes.

Through the swinging reversible wringer they go—which also operates electrically—and in less time than it takes to tell, out they come and are gaily nodding and fluttering on the sunny clothes lines, spotless and fresh as new.

And in the very same tub go the heaviest sheets and table linens; for the 1900 is a very democratic machine which washes everything equally well—all because of that famous Figure "8" motion.

If you would like to know more about the 1900 Washer write us for the book, GEORGE BRINTON'S WIFE, interesting fiction with some surprising facts included.

The water swirls through the clothes in a Figure "8" motion four times as often as in the ordinary washer.

Developing a National Art

IN an autumn issue of the JOURNAL we shall publish an article by Marion Long on this important subject, in which every progressive Canadian should be interested.

Above is pictured a group of the girl graduates, Practical Arts Class, Kelvin High School, Winnipeg. All these girls made their own dresses and hats. They were restricted to an expenditure of eight dollars for hats and twelve dollars for dresses. Let us hope they used Pictorial Review patterns for the latter.

The campaign against the high prices in England of clothing has spread to river parties on the Thames. Overalls are more practical and quite as comfortable as flannels for the punter. The photograph shows Mr. Bertram Burleigh, the famous British cinema actor, enjoying an afternoon on the river with a lady friend, both clad in overalls.

Sewing in the Schools

unskillfully done and the time taken to finish the work is longer.

If the teacher fixes the work for the class, she burdens herself unnecessarily and deprives the girls of valuable practice.

All the teacher should do, is to turn down an inch or two, or put in a few pins as a guide or in demonstration.

The plan of allowing the senior grades to fix hems and seams for the juniors has been successfully tried in several schools.

Beginners need to be warned against pulling and stretching the goods out of shape when making turnings.

Fixing a Corner—Say on a Band.

All work to be fixed must be pinned before basting and basted before sewing.

If two pins are inserted in the manner shown in illustration, when fixing a band to a skirt, the difficulty of inserting the pins through several thicknesses of stuff and at the same time keeping the corner in position, is avoided and the work is made much easier.

When pinning a band to a skirt or petticoat, it is not a good plan to begin at one end and pin along to the other, for it will generally be found that one or other appears to be too long. The better method is to pin both ends, the middle and the quarters, having previously measured and marked the divisions on both band and skirt.

When doing the second side of a band or of run and fell seams or pieces on the bias, see that there is no bulge on the back of the seam (i.e., the right side). It helps children to explain that machine stitches or running stitches must be just visible on right side when the work is pressed flat into position.

Wide hems and hems on curved edges are usually difficult for little inexperienced fingers but good results can be obtained in the following way.

(a) Turn down first narrow fold, pressing well.

(b) From this folded edge, measure the width of the hem and insert a pin at right angles to the edge pointing towards the folded edge. Do this at intervals round the garment.

(c) Fold where the pin is inserted, remove the pin, putting it in, in a similar way, through the double material.

(d) Continue to crease between the pins all round, pin the bottom of the hem if necessary and baste all round at the edge.

Fixing Pleats.

Use a pencil (colored) or chalk rather than pins, to mark the stuff at regular intervals ready for pleating.

Exercise great care in putting these marks on the edge of the material so that they may be covered over and hidden when the band is put on.

Her once plain but attractive face has grown hard and furrowed with lines of worry and anxiety. She has lost the love and admiration of her husband, who used to adore her. She is losing the substance of her life and happiness, and is grasping at the shadow of a pitiful gaiety, a hollow mockery.

TIME and Money—

We want and we will liberally pay one energetic lady in each community to represent the "Canadian Home Journal."

We already have scores of local representatives in our big Home Journal Club, and some are making as high as $100.00 per month.

There are still many towns and villages in Canada in which we have not a representative, and if you have any spare time that you desire to turn into money, write us to-day.

The remuneration of a "Canadian Home Journal" representative is according to the time and activity devoted to the work.

If you have plenty of time and energy, there is practically no limit to your income or territory, for we make special provision for the live ones.

The women of Canada require more money to-day than at any time in the history of the nation. The "Home Journal" will supply that money in exchange for your time.

Write us to-day.

THE amazing strides recently made by the silk industry in this country have prepared us for the beautiful array of gorgeously designed fabrics offered for the Fall season of 1920. There are a large variety of hand-blocked silks which may be used for charming overblouses. Lovely as these are, however, they have to compete with a fabric of more ancient origin—the exquisite tie-dyed silks which were first made in India. Printed Georgette crêpes are also to be had, and indeed, the woman who is tired of the conservative fabrics will find plenty of novelties from which to choose.

Artistic Dress For Children

By JANET PAYNE BOWLES

THERE is a two-fold significance in putting dress upon a child. Unless intelligently done, it may lead to mild corruption, but if wisely considered, it may mean education and true happiness to him. The child longs for beautiful clothes. Indeed, his first sentiment regarding them is pure admiration, which is the seed of art knowledge. His second thought is to use his clothes for imaginative play: to play the adult, or the fine princess, or a tree, a flower, or a fairy.

The moment this emotion is observed in him is the time to dress him decoratively and, in a sense, with his co-operation. During the nursery period, the only considerations for clothes should be those of purity and plainness. But when the child begins to create his images, he uses himself as a factor in them, and, like an actor, he must be appropriately dressed for his scenes. If not in reality, he will pretend to be so, and we may by dress supply this pretense with ground for further imaginative invention; so making him the practical illustrator of his dreams. The child's game of too much pretense, without appropriate symbols or attributes, leads to poetic starvation and the capacity for fruitless longings, if it does not soon end in apathy. Since this sentiment is the commonest curse of the race, it befits us as psychologists to impart to our children a different spirit. That is easily done by teaching them to master externals and to assimilate their beauty. Our dissatisfaction comes because we do not know how to make the most of the beauty of our small possessions, and to appropriate the spirit of what we do not actually and materially possess. No one who understands the law of beauty is ever unhappy from his limited circumstances. All children love color, and their delight to wear it is like the basking of insects in the sunshine. It is the atmosphere which they seek. Even an infant takes a mood directly from a color, and the result of incorrect combinations is to make a child restless. It acts as an obstacle to the flow of his fancy and the action of his reason, and if this grave error occur in his dress, he feels ashamed, without knowing why. But he will wear correctly produced effects of richness and brilliancy, with courage, in the presence of his plainly attired companions.

The dress having been adapted to the mental necessities of the child, there is a further and purely artistic question to be considered. This is a question of size. The rule of following the line of the figure, which is generally observed in artistic clothing for adults, does not apply to the garments of small children. Their forms have not yet reached symmetrical development, their space is too small to be considered in lines. They demand mass; although a detail which is in scale with them and which does not detract from the color mass, gives a peculiar beauty to childish dress. Striped cloth, made in a single piece, in which the lines are a feature of mass, would, however, afford an archaic beauty. Plaids, especially large ones, although having interest for children by reason of clan sentiments, are difficult to use, suggesting too plainly a geometrical division of a space already divided by Nature; although a square pattern placed on end seems a picturesque perversion and a design quite correct for use in small garments. The size and proportions of children constitute in themselves a lovable quaintness. Yet if these proportions be divided unreasonably, they become grotesque. We laugh unavailably at the sight of a little fellow cut up into compartments by his cap, the line of his hair, a sailor collar, a bolero jacket, a blouse, a belt, little trousers, by half-stockings giving two spaces to his very short legs, by his shoes making still another division: all these accented by arrangement of color. But the quaintness of children may be an opportunity for using an exaggerated figure with telling effect: such as an enormous plume, far exceeding the scale of the wearer's height, or a buckle, or a bow, if it be not placed out of balance. Still, these points must have the whole stage of costume based upon a solid mass of color, or they will begin to play tricks of jugglery with smaller details.

Responsibility

Year after year the tendency has grown to look to the House of Gossard for authoritative corset styles. Ours is the responsibility to KNOW: to know which of the many style influences that each season clamor for attention are worthy of consideration; to know those unchanging principles of good taste that must always form the foundation of correct corsetry.

The responsibility of our leadership is emphasized at this time when the ever-vital topic of fair price is uppermost in the minds of the public. The high principles of merchandising upon which we established and have maintained our reputation of responsibility is your best assurance that the Gossard Corsets you buy today represent a fair value and that your every dollar has a full purchasing power of 100 cents.

THE CHARM OF BEING NATURAL

The French beauty and wit, Madame De Sévigné, once wrote her daughter, "Never quit the natural; it forms a complete style."

Here is epitomized the secret of becomingness in dress. Be natural. Nature should be assisted, not deformed with exaggerated styles and false originality.

The Gossard Corsets for Autumn and Winter are, as always, fashioned to accent the natural beauty of your figure. Harmony of line is expressed in every corset and whatever your needs there are many models that will emphasize your personal attractiveness.

Beauty always finds its perfect expression in movement; the most flawless statue of faultless proportions is not comparable with the beauty of wind-driven clouds, or the rhythm of waters, or the grace of the flying bird. The corset that does not give you the comfort of unrestrained movement can never give you beauty.

It is no task to create a corset that will repress the figure to a desired silhouette at the expense of comfort and grace, but we hold it art to produce these Gossards that will fairly persuade every type of figure to graceful lines and proportions with a comfortable, healthful support that expresses itself in poise and distinction of carriage.

During these months of increasing costs, and in the face of unequalled difficulties of present-day manufacture, Gossard quality has been consistently maintained without permitting these unprecedented conditions to affect unduly the cost of Gossard Corsets to you. They are still nominally priced within the reach of every woman and you may buy every Gossard with the assurance that it will be worth every cent you pay for it—worth it in style, worth it in comfort, and worth it in wearing service.

A Forecast of Autumn Fashions

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

Rich Colors and Beautiful Fabrics Are Made Up In Simple Styles

Here are two pieces of delicate machine-made lace to be used for neck and sleeves.

DOES any one who reads this page by any chance remember the rich coloring of the upturned earth, damp with springtime rains or drying three-quarters on afternoon silk and satin models, and some of the dance frocks have quaint little puffs at the shoulder in lieu of sleeves. Many round necks are to be seen, but one learns on good authority that their popularity is passing, and that ere long we shall call those that are square or pointed a la mode.

We look back to the fashion plates of long ago, showing trim figures wearing redingotes, and rejoice that Fashion has been pleased to sanction their reincarnation, a little different perhaps, but redin-gotes nevertheless, and we make bold to predict that they will meet with more favor than another old-time style that has also been revived for this fall, namely, basque dresses which show the curve at the waist line slightly. They are pretty and quaint and trim, but not quite so wearable as those planned on straighter lines, except, of course, for the dance frock, on which the bodice is quite snugly fitted.

Afternoon dresses of silk, say crepe de Chine or satin, the latter preferably, have loose or flying panels, sometimes very narrow, or perhaps a knee-length rippling tunic or a longer one, the fullness of which is emphasized by the narrowness of the underskirt, and it is interesting to observe that where the designer introduces bouffancy, on the smarter models, it is brought around to the back with a vague suggestion of a bustle, either in the drapery or the method of tying the sash.

The fall suit is an investment which, at present prices, one does not enter into lightly. One wants to be sure of it in every particular, hence this little resume of what will constitute the vogue when the stores announce their fall fashion parades a little later. There are two extremes of fashion—the very long and the very short coat. The short suit coat has long been regarded as impractical for the Canadian climate and to many the extra long one is regarded as too extreme, therefore a compromise has been made on one that is a couple of inches longer than finger-tip length. Under the arm there is just the suggestion of a curve without being snug. The shoulders are flat and narrow and the set-in sleeve is tight-fitting with a cuff that flares ever so slightly over the hand; and the collar,—and here we have some thing that is both new and sensible—it stands up around the neck instead of being flat with lapels. Even the swagger sport suit composed of plain coat and checked skirt does this. Of course there are some exceptions, but this stand-up-and-protect-the-throat type is the collar of the season especially if it is made of fur, and we must emphasize the vogue of fur trimmings; never mind if fur is almost priceless this season. Back panels and side pleats play a leading role in many of the new suits and as for embroidery, it is used most lavishly, especially on such materials as duvetyn.

And just at this season, wraps are a timely subject. Canadians have ever been noted for their conservative tastes, and one of the things we do not as a whole—meaning the womenfolk of course—take kindly to is anything in the nature of a wrap. We like something that is snug and cosy, and as a consequence give the coat with regular sleeves the preference. Nevertheless, wrappy coats are the fashion for this winter and it remains to see whether we shall accept the dictate of Fashion or follow our own sweet will. The wraps really are very charming and we believe will make a strong appeal to the women who wish to be smartly arrayed, and what woman doesn't? Just one word further regarding wraps, and for that matter coats too—they have huge collars that look like shoulder capes, and as if they proposed to defy what used to signify our worst type of storm—"a north-west blizzard."

New York's far famed Museum of Natural History has scarcely more to boast of in birdlife than the wholesale millinery houses have to offer this season. Feathers are made use of in almost every possible form, except as birds. They are substituted for the pressed felt hat shape, that is, a buckram shape, say a tricorne or a chin chin, is covered flat with feathers, or a turban crown and brim is composed of feathers so wonderfully pasted together that you can crush it in the hand and it goes back to shape as soon as it is released. There are brims and bandeaux of heckle feathers and of glycerined ostrich. Coq feathers and long whips with a tassel of the fibres at the end, sweeps that trail behind, ostrich mounts, small lacquered wings—everything almost, that can be devised with feathers, save birds.

in the sunshine, last spring at seed time? Do you remember, as you motored along the country roads, the sandy loam, the blackish and the reddish browns and the greys of the newly plowed ground and of the fields already planted? Also, do you remember the blue-grey haze shrouding the distant mountain, the green of the hemlock grove by the water's edge and the sombre gloom of the pine tree's tassels? If you do, you already have a mental vision, a forecast as it were, of some of the colors which Fashion has elected that womenkind shall adopt for street costumes this autumn, which, impossible as it seems, is only a few weeks distant.

It was April last when the tillers of the soil were preparing the ground for the harvest which they are now reaping, that the fall color card came to our desk, and on subsequent journeyings east and west, it did not require much stretching of the imagination to find a resemblance between the shades of the fertile fields and those of the card which had so recently come to hand. It seemed unfortunate to us then, that those who had the naming of the colors could not have taken names more indicative to suggest to our minds the exact shade of these new and beautiful colors the skill of the dyer had produced, instead of many of those they have given them, which convey little or nothing to our mental eye.

There is a soft, almost neutral shade, called plover, which resembles sandy loam when it is wet, and there is a darker shade, called owl, and darker still, and not unlike the tone so well described as tete de negre, is a color called Nubian, because each season we must have a set of new names. Hindu is a dark reddish brown, like the soil one finds at the root of a decayed tree, and Zanzibar is a little darker. Stag gets us back to the fields of sandy loam, and Manchu is a little darker than Stag and a little more on the rust cast. Arctic is the hazy blue-grey, and Swamp is the name given a color something like the green of the hemlock. There are two blues, one is called Admiral, and is very dark navy; the other is Corsair, somewhat brighter. In these colors come lovely cloths, such as duvetyn, vel-de-cygne, evora superior (pile fabric with a narrow rib), cord du vel (the same with a wider rib), Dianora (a silk duvetyn with an almost imperceptible rib)—these and others quite as beautiful are among the fall coatings and suitings, which even now are to be found displayed in the shops.

Tricotines, serges and duvetyns lend themselves admirably to the type of dress which Fashion has elected shall be the vogue for fall, yet, when we speak of the vogue, which of the three outstanding styles is going to take the lead? That is the question. One thing is sure, however, and that is that emphatic bouffancy for street wear, or even housewearing, is a thing of the past so far as the coming season is concerned. Parisian designers are featuring the straight silhouette in its simplest form, making up for any lack of drapery by a superabundance of embroidery, mainly on the skirt. New York is doing likewise, and Canadian designers are following suit. Navy-blue and white are gorgeously embroidered with white silk floss, wool or even white beads. Another trick the designer has this year is to pipe her creations with geranium pink. But this is getting away from the silhouette, which at all times is important, especially so at the beginning of a new season.

The very straight line dresses have a low waist line, possibly girdled with a silk cord, or if it is very youthful, it may have a Roman striped silk or satin sash, or better still, a sash of cire ribbon. Cire ribbon is a veritable rage. One finds it in all the fall fixings. The sleeves are long on street dresses and

A late Summer model in which navy tricotine and black satin conspire with a cire sash to captivate all and sundry.

FINGERING YARNS

—the yarns that you will enjoy using. Made from choicest long staple wool—selected for softness, evenness, elasticity and strength.

All Corticelli Fingering Yarns are put up in convenient balls, loosely and evenly wound. Do not buy yarn in skeins. When the skeins are wound by hand into balls, the yarn becomes stretched and thin and loses much of its soft, fluffy beauty.

Garments made from Corticelli Fingering Yarns always retain their shape. If washed properly, they will not shrink, nor lose their lustre and elasticity.

There is a special Corticelli Fingering Yarn for every knitting purpose. Be sure to select the right yarn for the article you plan to knit—and buy enough wool to complete the garment. All colors, including the new fashionable shades.

The Indian Dancer

By M. L. C. PICKTHALL.

Illustration by J. H. R. Millar.

Over his feet the fringes fell,
The fox-fur fringes, white as noon.
It seemed his feet were musical,
They never stayed in the slow tune
That ran and rippled and changed its bars
And chimed forever in falling notes,
As when the summer sings in stars
Of music born in bobolink-throats.

All his wild strength was given to this.
Scarce-plumed, the year's young grasses bent.
The warm air followed with a kiss
Along the pathway that he went.
Giving no light, the round moon stood
Behind the birches on the hill.
The summer silence of the wood
Was a gold cup for love to fill.

Red lily buds and blackening grapes
And mandrakes gemmed with ivory bloom—
The forest hid a thousand shapes
Like music in the scented gloom.
She saw, as flower or song made fair,
The last light glow on crest and limb.
One barred owl-plume was in his hair;
Like a white moth it danced with him.

Into her willow flute she breathed
Her soul with delicate outs-and-ins.
Her soul was with the dew that sheathed
Love's bead-work on his moccasins.
Her soul was in the fern that laid
Love's sweetness for his moving feet.
Between the moon-dawn and the shade
Her soul danced with the Malicete.

Hymn Tunes and Hymn Singing

How a Now Universal Christian Practice Overcame Neglect and Opposition

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH.

IF we look over the whole domain of music, its most widely applied form (on this continent, at any rate) still remains congregational singing as practiced in the Protestant churches of North America and in a lesser degree by the Roman Catholic communities. In the latter it does not hold a definite place as part of the ordinary agenda or ritual, but is nevertheless not neglected. The ordinary hymn tune is a type of music which is familiar to nearly everybody, even in districts where secular music is unavailable. Its beginnings should therefore be a subject of interest to most of the readers of this journal.

It is a singular fact that, though humanity has always sung songs, and while it may embody praise and teaching, also contains a prayer. In fact, a prayer, however brief, constitutes the logical ending of a hymn.

According to the early Christian tradition as voiced by St. John Chrysostom, in his Sixth Homily, the Apostles themselves composed the first hymn; and he tells of the methods employed in his own time when he says: "The Psalms which we sing unite all the voices in one, and the canticles arise harmoniously in unison. Young and old, rich and poor, women, men, slaves and citizens, all of us have formed but one melody together." There is even evidence relating to the numbers that were sung. Clemens Romanus, who is known to have been contemporary made music according to the peculiar modes of its nation, relics of the past in this particular art are very meagre. We have a vast body of remains of ancient architecture, ancient sculpture and ancient literature, but our knowledge of the music of humanity in the intimate sense inspired by concrete examples goes back not more than five hundred years. For that reason many persons carefully assume that the practice of congregational singing began with the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Nevertheless the evidence is positive that music was associated with religious devotion not merely in ages before Christ, but continuously after that until, in comparatively modern times, it began to be recorded in permanent form.

MONA BATES

The gifted Canadian pianist, who will this month play a second engagement at the Stadium Orchestral Concerts, New York, at which audiences numbering many thousands nightly enjoy good music at cheap prices.

Nothing connected with Christian tradition is more certain than that hymn singing was adopted as a practice by the churches of the apostolic age. The early fathers mention "love feasts," in which choral singing played a part, and, according to Eusebius St. Mark, the author of the gospel which bears his name, taught the earliest Egyptian converts to chant their prayers. It is worth while remembering that every true hymn, with St. Paul, records that at the evening meal the early Christians were in the habit of singing the twenty-third Psalm, and it is also known that the fifteenth chapter of Exodus (containing the songs of Moses and of Miriam, the prophetess) and the third chapter of Daniel (celebrating the deliverance of those who refused to worship Babylonian idols) also formed the basis of early Christian songs.

THE famous New England musical scholar, Louis C. Elson, who has written many books on the historical aspects of music, shows that the Catholic Church, after it had definitely attained a cohesive organization, made a sharp distinction between choir singing and congregational singing, and sought with only partial success to abolish the latter practice. And its councils passed edicts against the practice. In Germany, especially, the masses of devotees were rebellious, and the clergy, finding that they could not prevent their flocks from joining in the musical part of the services of the church, resolved to divert this popular singing into a fitting channel. They composed hymns to the Virgin and songs of the Nativity for congregational rendering, as distinct from the choral portions of the mass which were rendered by choirs composed of members of the minor clergy. Here we have the genesis of the German Lutheran Chorale and the modern hymn. The best known survival among the old Catholic hymns is Adeste Fidelis (O Come, All Ye Faithful), which is, however, not Germanic. Strangely enough, it did not come into use in Protestant churches until less than a century ago, when an Anglican vicar in London, England, who was identified with the Tractarian movement and anxious to revive to modern ears the ancient beauties of liturgy, translated it from the mediaeval Latin.

To go back to the hymnology of the Middle Ages. In Germany they produced what were known as Marien Lieder (songs of Mary) and an interesting story is related with regard to one of the most famous of them. During the fourteenth century the "Black Plague" the most devastating pestilence that western civilization had ever known, swept Europe. In many cities inhabitants sought to escape the disease by gathering provisions enough for a siege and shutting themselves up in their houses to bar out the destroying angel. At Goldberg in Germany a citizen lurked alone in his house on Christmas Eve, 1353, imagining himself the last survivor of all the people of the plague-stricken city. Resolved that death was better than such loneliness he sallied forth from his home singing a Marien-lied that he and many of his friends had, in happier days, sung on Christmas eve. He was astounded to hear his voice joined by another, and presently a second citizen unbarred his door and came forth singing the same hymn. As they went about the deserted streets of the town they rallied by the lure of sacred song twenty-five men, women and children the only persons in the whole city who had escaped the "Black Death." Together the little band marched to Niederring singing the now famous hymn, "Uns ist ein Kind-lein heut geboren";

"To us this day is born a child,
God with us.
"His mother is a virgin mild,
God with us, God with us,
Against us who dare be?"

On how many occasions since have groups of human beings, in fear of death, awaiting the sinking of a ship or some other catastrophe found consolation in hymn singing!

For centuries Christmas Eve was celebrated by the inhabitants of Goldberg with the singing of "Uns ist ein Kindlein" and a march to Niederring, and the custom spread to many parts of Germany. I have spoken at some length of this hymn because it had a sentimental aftermath in the case of at least one Canadian officer, who was on duty in occupied Germany on Christmas Eve, 1918,—shortly after armistice. It was his fifth Christmas overseas and he was naturally depressed with all he had gone through. As he passed through the streets of the little town that was his headquarters, he heard a German peasant woman in a humble home singing this hymn with her children and the sentiment cheered him with the belief that there was still hope for tortured Europe. He did not even know the beautiful legend attached to that particular hymn, the words of which have formed the basis of many English adaptations, but I communicated its message.

It was evidence of the great organizing power of Martin Luther that he early seized on the importance of popular hymnology and greatly extended this rooted institution of his own country by identifying Protestantism with hymnology. His first hymn book which largely consisted of a revision of existing songs of praise was entitled "Enchiridion" printed at Erfurt in 1524. The last remaining copy of it, preserved in the city library of Strasbourg, Alsace, was destroyed in the German bombardment of that city during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870.

Nevertheless it would be an error to assume that our modern practice of hymn singing on this continent is directly traceable to Luther. Among the Protestant reformers there were many opponents of music in the churches. Calvin's anti-musical views strongly influenced many of the new sects, including the Presbyterians and Puritans, who restricted music to the most severe and ascetic forms.

On the other hand the "Separatists" originally a Dutch sect, otherwise

We also wish to have photographs of historic or unusual quilts, with story attached—limit of eight hundred words in length. Prize, fifteen dollars.

Photographs and stories must be sent by November 1st, 1920. Competitors must be subscribers to this journal and also members of the Women's Institute. Mention branch of Institute when writing. The stories should be written on one side of the paper. Photographs will not be returned. Address "Institutes," Canadian Home Journal, 71 Richmond St. W., Toronto.

Some Things You Can Make with Honey

Honey Custard Pudding.—Toast very slightly eight slices of stale bread. Cut each slice into small squares. Butter the squares and with them cover the bottom of a well greased pudding or fireproof dish. Sprinkle with a few currants or spread with jam and dust lightly with powdered nutmeg or cinnamon. Put in another layer of bread, more raisins and cinnamon and continue until all the bread is used up. Make a custard of one and one-half cupfuls of milk, six tablespoonfuls of honey and a pinch of salt. Bring to boiling point in a double boiler and stir in three well beaten eggs. Remove from the fire and continue stirring until cool. Pour the honey custard over the bread and bake in a moderate oven for one-half hour.

Honey Tapioca Pudding.—Stir one-half cupful of tapioca into one quart of boiling milk. Continue stirring, and when it begins to thicken add one-half cupful of honey, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one beaten egg and one tablespoonful of butter. Flavor with powdered nutmeg, vanilla, fruit, nuts or fruit juice. Pour into a buttered baking dish, and bake in a moderate oven until firm. The egg may be omitted, or yolk of egg only may be used and white served as meringue. Or the tapioca may be cooked until transparent, on top of the stove in a double boiler. The stiffly beaten white may be folded in before serving. It may be served hot or turned into moulds and served cold.

Honey Frosting.—Boil one cupful of honey with one-fourth cupful of water until it forms a soft ball when tried in cold water, or 240°F., on candy thermometer; pour on to the stiffly beaten white of one egg adding a pinch of salt to egg, and beat until thick enough to spread.

Hymn Tunes

known as "Independents" and ultimately as "Congregationists,"—satirized by Shakespeare and Ben Johnson as "Brownists"—and sometimes persecuted by the Puritans,—tolerated and utilized hymns in connection with their worship. It seems fitting at a time when the tercentenary of the coming of the Pilgrim Fathers to America is being celebrated to record the fact that it was the now scattered Congregational churches which introduced congregational singing to this continent. Though the Puritans, who settled in Boston afterward obtained domination, the original Pilgrims of Plymouth were not of that sect but Separatists. They brought with them from Leyden in Holland, their hymnal which contained at least five tunes still used in the churches of this continent. The most famous of these is "Old Hundred," but others which figure as accompaniments to many hymns of different literary contents are the tunes known as "York," "Windsor," "Hackney," and "Martyrs."

The history of the manner in which hymn singing gradually carried the day in all parts of this vast continent, with its many denominations, despite Puritan and Calvinistic opposition is long, but not especially interesting. It did not really take hold in Great Britain until the time of John Wesley's revivals,—and the foundation of Methodism. The Established Church, though maintaining choirs in its Cathedrals, paid little or no attention to hymn singing in its smaller churches until well toward the end of the eighteenth century. Indeed it was not until the famous spiritual revival within the ranks of the Anglican church, less than one hundred years ago, that hymnology became a definite field of literary and original musical effort in that communion, although, in connection with certain religious festivals, music had long played a definite and considerable part.

In this article the writer has not attempted to exhaust the subject; but merely to write a few suggestive notes on a subject which is familiar, yet unfamiliar, for millions of people sing hymns habitually, and are yet unaware of all that lies back of the practice.

KLIM

Delicious Cakes

When the recipe includes milk, try KLIM—pure separated milk. For cakes, pies, and all cooked dishes, KLIM gives that delicious genuine milk flavor.

KLIM is the food part of pure pasteurized separated milk dried into powder form. In the drying process, only the water is removed from the liquid separated milk. This you replace when making liquid Klim.

Klim will not sour nor spoil and remains fresh and sweet until the last particle is used. One pound makes four quarts of liquid.

One great advantage in using KLIM is that you spoon the dry powder out of the tin and dissolve it in water by briskly whipping for a moment just whenever you need it, for cooking, baking, tea, coffee, or cocoa, etc.

Keep an ample supply on hand and you will find it so convenient and economical to use, and the flavor so satisfying, that you will use KLIM in preference.

Your grocer has KLIM in the blue-and-white striped half pound, pound, and ten pound tins.

The Girls' "Carry-On" Club

By BETTY O'HARA

WITH the calm, clear days of early September comes the ambition to be up and doing. We have spent more money on our holidays than we even dare to think of by soothing our troubled conscience with the promise that we can easily make it up when we go back to the office, or that perhaps a few days' early rising and a rustling after bargains will do much to lighten the financial burden of the cost of our new fall clothes.

So with the best of intentions and the strongest of resolutions you return to your work. Everything runs wonderfully, alarmingly smooth. The exasperating habit of whispering and the constant chuckle of the girl beside you worries you not at all, or the crabby old lady who insists that you show her nearly every piece of goods in the store, and finally decides that she will not take any to-day, does not affect you in the least.

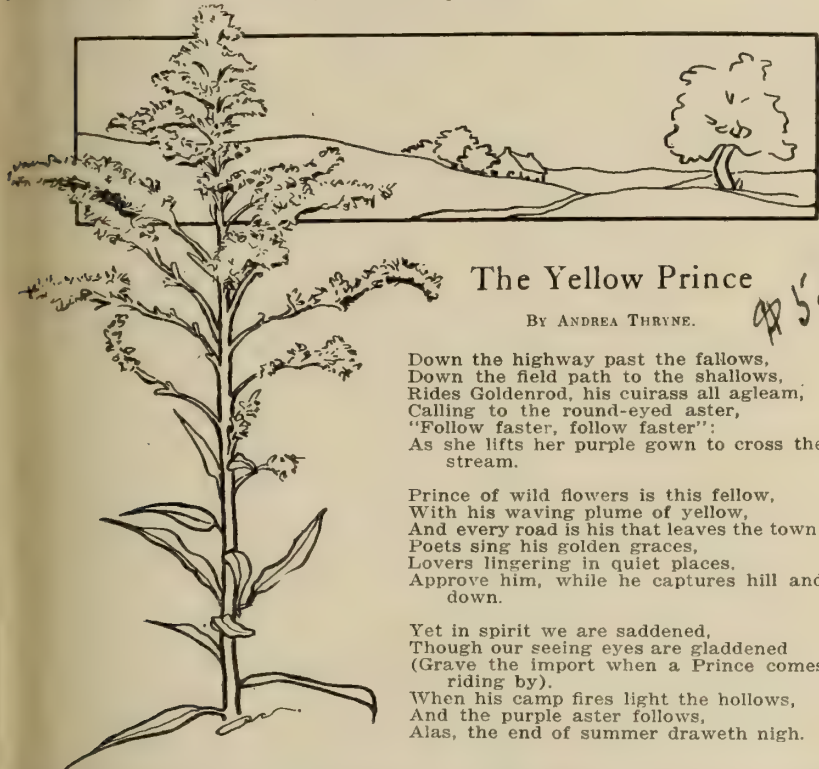

You never felt better in your life. And nerves! You wonder that you ever possessed any; so unobtrusive have they become that you marvel at the fact that they ever asserted themselves. And ambition has taken a marvellous stride; you feel that nine o'clock is none too early to be at the office; you have lots of "pep" for evening frivolities, and the day dawns for you no longer with a weary stretch our aim a very useful and necessary one.

Mildred found that the club carried her to the height of her ambition when she financed a year's study in New York.

FOR the last two years she had saved almost half the money from her pay envelope she received as stenographer for Lewis and Sons, the wholesale grocers. Art, when she started out, had been her hobby, taking an evening class to enable her to reproduce more intelligently on canvas the varied lines in which Nature so gaily decks her flowers and fields. Then she became interested, so much so that the early morning found her busily at work on her canvas, while the sunrise burned and glowed under her deft fingers. Sunsets also came in for a fair share of attention, and moonlit waters danced and sparkled as she transferred her thoughts with brush and paint.

An unexpected streak of financial good luck enabled her to attend art school during the afternoons, and through the kindness of her employers, the mornings were fully occupied with her former vocation; and, although the weekly pay envelope was not as large as formerly, yet it was quite a little above what she might have expected.

The Yellow Prince

By ANDREA THRYNE.

Down the highway past the fallows,
Down the field path to the shallows,
Rides Goldenrod, his cuirass all agleam,
Calling to the round-eyed aster,
"Follow faster, follow faster":
As she lifts her purple gown to cross the stream.

Prince of wild flowers is this fellow,
With his waving plume of yellow,
And every road is his that leaves the town:
Poets sing his golden graces,
Lovers lingering in quiet places,
Approve him, while he captures hill and down.

Yet in spirit we are saddened,
Though our seeing eyes are gladdened (Grave the import when a Prince comes riding by).
When his camp fires light the hollows,
And the purple aster follows,
Alas, the end of summer draweth nigh.

and a yawn and the vain hope that some miracle may be performed that you will not be expected to be in your accustomed place of business.

Strange to say, your finances are the only part of your equipment to be depleted, and the tragedy of it all is the fact that the weekly salary is insufficient to cover the current expenses and pay the back debts of the holidays, not even forgetting the sad but astounding information that greets you on your return that your room rent has gone up a dollar a week during your absence.

THEN there is your fall wardrobe to be considered, and with the ever-soaring scale of the high cost of living, this is indeed the hardest problem the average girl must combat with. The morning bargains that you had put such faith in as a money-saving device have resolved themselves into a clearance of summer garments and dress materials, and the fall suits have risen in price beyond your wildest fears, which the dreamy memory of a wonderful summer cannot easily dispel. But fact, and not fancy, is what the modern girl must deal with; she must pay dollar for dollar for her purchases. The girl who buys on the instalment plan, paying ten dollars down for a fifty-dollar suit, will sooner or later be wrecked on the rock of her own indiscretion. So Elva thought when she wrote to me a few days ago asking the Carry On Club to help her out of a financial difficulty in which she had become involved.

Of course, you must not think that the emblem of the "Carry On Club" means trouble; in fact, it is quite the reverse. Most of our club girls find

The weeks stretched into months, and the months to a year, and Mildred's hobby began to be her one aim in life. For six months she attended the art school in her own city mornings, afternoons and all the evenings she could spare. And it was just at this time that she and the Carry On Club became acquainted, for she wrote to us, asking us to help her make some extra money.

"You know, Betty," she wrote, "I can only spend a couple of hours a day for money-making, and as you know, I could not get a position for that short time. So, I thought the Carry On Club would help me."

The Carry On Club did help her, for Mildred is leaving this fall for New York to finish her course as a commercial artist. Of course, she hopes some day to be able to paint some of the large canvases that the public admire so much, but in the meantime she wants to insure for herself a good financial basis.

We are all so proud of Mildred, and we know she is going to make such a wonderful success of her work, that we want to help the other girls to make a financial success of their ambition.

Our wish is to help the girls who need just a few dollars to put them on Easy Street or give them their heart's desire.

That is why we want you to write to the Girls' Carry On Club, so that you, too, can make the money which will help you follow your ambition into the mists of the future.

thousand and one intolerable, selfish vulgarities that man indulges as his privilege in business whilst thrusting upon woman as the price of his deference the most stringent subservience to convention.

When a woman goes into business she is expected to submerge personality in the firm's methods. This a man never does unless under compulsion. In nine cases out of ten a man will try when dealing with a woman to force her to make her office methods fit his own trifling idiosyncrasies. Stenographers and women clerks could explain how their efficiency is gauged by their ability to cater to all the silly little fads of outside business heads. Indeed there isn't any person on earth more old maidish than the ordinary man in business. For every man in a law office or behind a counter has his own special band box, bird cage and carpet bag that he insists on each female clerk doing homage to as a guarantee of efficiency and adaptability. All things being equal you will find woman in business display an amount of orderliness far outshining her masculine confrere. She is usually simpler and quicker in her methods. But method to her is second nature, and she never talks about it or advertises it. By subtle finesse she will usually reach the goal without fuss whilst man is laboriously wading his way by sheer brute force, and, of course, the noise he makes is proof positive of the importance of his task, and the goal being reached of the superiority of his methods.

THEN we come to the impersonality of business life, the self-control, self-effacement and suave neutrality of the individual required in offices. Well, if as a woman you go to consult a strange business man you usually are submerged in pompous dignity and enigmatic non-committal neutrality. But if you go to work for a hum-drum or a professional big-wig it is another story. You have left the shelter of home to work, therefore you cease to have a claim on man for deference to your sex. It is truly appalling sometimes to note the difference between a man's tone to any kind of a woman who doesn't earn her living, and the woman with whom he is associated in business. And usually young girls never realize the barrier they should raise in order to prevent slipshod familiarities until it is too late. You will hear lawyers and court officials call their stenographers by their Christian names as a matter of course, just as you would address your horse or your dog. You will also find that three-quarters of the business men when associating with woman at work will indulge and even manoeuvre an intimate personal proximity, the touch of hands or fingers, the pressing of shoulder to shoulder, that he would study to avoid were he with a lady he respected, and that would never occur to him were he with a man. You will find that few employers know much about the home life, the love affairs or the religious and political views of their female clerks, but you will find that a woman can nearly always furnish you with the most startling details concerning the life history and domestic affairs of her employer. This, of course, you will say is because she insists upon prying into personal matters. That is not generally the reason. Women no doubt talk more but they probably tell less than men. Likewise her employer is very rarely the man towards whom a woman indulges a sentimental interest. He is the concrete evidence of her wage earning status, and he is usually the least romantic figure in the universe. But man knows, however circumspect a woman, her attitude is rarely impersonal. She is by nature a born sympathizer and as such should be utilized, and so, reckless of consequences, business men almost invariably insist on their feminine employees assuming the role of personal confidant. And it sometimes is as dangerous and difficult to evade this expansiveness as it was the ancient mariner.

Whatever the reasons, and they are legion, the fact remains that whilst women in business refuse to become machines and fossils, they are nevertheless of the two sexes the least responsible for interchange of personalities and intimacies. You can argue and talk forever but the fact remains that man daily refuses to admit women to the same bread-winning status as man. Of course, he maintains that she does not want equality, but superiority, privileges and pampering, less work, big pay and fantastic accommodations, and no responsibility. Strange if she does that in business, for she has never done it anywhere else. For a woman will work uncomplainingly at home with tools and utensils that no man would tolerate for a moment. And you will never find her demanding the latest make in swivel chairs nor accumulating all the office trinkets and fads with which men litter their desks, neither does she consider three-dollar pencil sharpeners indispensable. You can shove two men's work onto one girl for the same pay and get excellent service. The banks did that during the war: I know cases where instead of taking a competent senior ineligible male and giving him two men's work and pay, a junior girl was raised to the two-man job and given one man's salary. To-day I know several banks where the female staff are gingerly selected from matriculated students of courteous bearing and nice social standing, whilst the male juniors are cheeky, ill-bred sons of uneducated or illiterate laborers and mechanics. And their incompetency is a shining example to all customers who do business. Women in public life do demand a greater deference to the amenities of life than men have been perhaps accustomed to give. They are critical of uncleanly habits, of vile odors and vulgar informalities. But they do not ask for light work and big pay. A superabundance of work and no pay has been their lot for too many centuries, and, sad to relate, in order to keep their posts they are compelled to give extra service, to cultivate efficiency and present and substantiate testimonials as a mere boy or man would never be required to do. Only a gentleman with astute understanding and seeing eyes will admit the "fierce light" that beats upon a business woman "and blackens every blot." And by a gentleman I don't mean a parvenu nor an idler nor an arrogant bouncer.

But I fear all the eloquence of the ages would never convince man that these charges are true. The heavy influx of female workers into the world's market-places will in time force a juster status. But in the meantime suffragettes will continue their agitation hoping to hasten the end. And man will blink and storm and berate their lunacy, but he will find it hard to appreciate the cause of the tempest. For the deadliest enemy to platonism is the male sex. And he cherishes little other philosophy concerning woman save good old Shakespeare's dictum: "She is a woman therefore to be wooed. She is a woman therefore may be won."

NIAGARA FALLS.—It is encouraging to hear that you find this page helpful and the advice you ask for will be gladly sent to you privately. To my knowledge the treatment I am suggesting has never been the cause of any ill-effect. I quite agree with you that the inconvenience is great and I hope that you will find this remedy worth the trouble.

SCHOOL MA'AM.—Resting from your task of teaching the young idea, you lucky girl! and starting up on that long holiday which your sisterhood enjoys. Think of all the time you have for the pursuit of beauty. Red hands are a trial. Poor circulation may be responsible for yours as there seems to be no other cause, but the preparation of which I am writing you will be helpful, I am sure.

STELLA A.—Here I am at last with apologies for the long delay. You are a lady after my own heart, Stella, and indeed I do think thirty much too young to be sallow and wrinkled! Are you sure that the glass spoke truly when it told you that you were either or both of these? For the sallow skin, it may be that you are not enough in the open air, are not careful about your diet, or that you do not get sufficient sleep. Perhaps, it is just a skin tonic that is needed and if this should be the case I shall supply you with the name of one which I have known to be beneficial. Meanwhile, Stella, cheer up! Wrinkles at thirty are not too deeply rooted to hold the fort against well-planned beauty warfare.

UL-IK-IT SUN BURN LOTION

Is cooling, soothing. Gives immediate relief to the smart and pain of irritated skin. Apply freely and let remain on skin a few minutes, then wash off. It is a sure cure for sunburn, five minutes application will take all the heat away.

Marjaneh Wrinkle Cream (Mar-shan-eh)

We believe we have the only vanishing cream on the market. It is centuries old, delicately scented Arabian nut oil lotion. It tones up the tiny glands beneath the outer skin, thereby erasing lines, rounding out the face, imparting attractive color that radiates health and loveliness.

Positively does not grow hair. Money refunded if noticeable improvement is not seen within a reasonable time. Get some MARJANEH to-day. For sale by Holt, Rinehart & Co., Toronto, and all high class druggists. Price, 50c and $1.00.

over the top of the bank and was lost to view. As it disappeared, Diddy discovered that something else had gone, too; the little If was nowhere to be seen!

Dedder Naherrin was in a great way, as was Diddy, for they both knew that in some way the Pink Star had sailed away with the If on its back. They climbed the bank, and though the September road stretched straight and level in front of them, neither Star nor If could they see.

"Never mind," said Dedder. "Nothing bad ever happens along this road, so the If is sure to be all right."

There were more orchards by the roadside, as they walked onward. The forest grew denser, too, as they neared the end of the September road. Soon there was nothing but woods on each side of the path, and, almost before they knew, they were at the beginning of the October highway.

October morn, a mellow sun, the wood of Fancy Free,

The first lace-patterns of Jack Frost still lingering in the shade,

The squirrels holding carnival up in each spreading tree,

For it is nutting-time, you know, within the magic glade.

The sunshine of the summer days, and summer blossoms, too,

Are quite forgotten in the joy October mornings bring;

For it is nutting-time, you know, and all the forest through,

Glad voices of the woodland folk come echoing as they sing.

We garner in our forest store against the winter day,

For we are Autumn's harvesters a-bringing in the sheaves.

While all around, and up above, the morning sunbeams play,

And make the gold and jewels in the rainbow of the leaves.

The Future of the I. O. D. E.

regard suspiciously the word "empire," and should be caught easily by the devices of the demagogue? We, who are Canadians by birth, and have known all the blessings of a free country and a constitutional government can have little idea of the bitterness with which many European newcomers regard all governments with which the word, "imperial," may be connected. It is more important, at this time, to have imagination than even to have sympathy. Put yourself in the place of the strange citizen, try to grasp what imperialism has meant (to him or to her) and then endeavor to show our new Canadian what our imperialism means.

THE War Memorial Fund of the I.O.D.E. to which this Journal devoted an article last December, is a project which is in keeping with the needs of Canada's new day. Educational opportunity is craved to-day as never before, and you have only to ask the presidents of our universities and the principals of our secondary schools to be assured that the youth of Canada is eager for the class-room and the campus with a new zest for all that school work and play imply. There is no one more deserving of educational opportunity than the child of a soldier or a sailor, who has given his life or his strength in the service of his country. Hence it is encouraging to know that already applications have been made for the scholarships which form part of the I.O.D.E. War Memorial plans. Young women are to have equal share in these opportunities and the good which will accrue from the widened outlook of these young students will be the Order's best reward.

The educational campaign of the I.O.D.E. has already accomplished much and the libraries and pictures have proved a boon, indeed, to many of the schools.

To help in the great work of Canadianizing the new citizen, to encourage the ambitious young student will surely be enough to absorb any institution's energies. Above all, the I.O.D.E. can remind us that Canada has a dual loyalty, fealty to the Empire and patriotic pride in the Dominion.

Every complexion needs soap

IF you have the superstition that soap does not agree with your skin, one of two things is wrong. You are either using the wrong soap, or the right soap the wrong way.

True, an oily skin needs different care from one which is over dry. But dirt, oily secretions, powder, that touch of rouge, must be washed away. Otherwise they will clog the pores and actually poison the skin.

Cleopatra knew this simplest of beauty secrets. Those who picture her as depending upon cosmetics to enhance her beauty are sadly wrong. It is true she rouged and probably powdered, as most women do today. But thorough, radiant cleanliness was her first law.

How did Cleopatra wash her face?

In Palm and Olive Oils, Nature's gentle cleansers, just as you may today. While hers was a crude combination and yours the perfected blend, the principle is the same.

Buy a cake of Palmolive Soap, made from these same fine oils, and follow these simple directions. They will make your skin smooth and soft, your complexion clear, fresh, glowing and rosy.

If you have an oily skin

Rub up a stiff Palmolive lather between your hands and massage it softly into your skin until it penetrates every pore. Rub gently. You mustn't roughen the delicate texture of the skin with harsh treatment. Use pleasantly warm water.

Then dissolve this creamy lather with gentle rinsing, cooling the water until it is refreshingly cold. Keep on rinsing until you are sure that every particle is washed away—carrying with it the dirt, excess oil deposits, dead skin, dried perspiration, the remaining traces of rouge and powder—all poisonous deposits which clog pores and invite blackheads, blotches and general skin imperfections.

A clean skin is a healthy skin, as all physicians will tell you.

If your skin is dry

If you must supplement the natural oils of the skin with applications of cold cream, apply a generous coat of Palmolive Cold Cream before you do any washing.

Then follow the same directions given above. Be just as thorough in applying the lather, rinse just as carefully. Dry your face gently with soft clean towel, and then look into your mirror. You will find your skin as smooth as velvet, supple and fine textured. A final touch of the cream may be added as desired.

The striking thing about Palmolive

Manufactured in small quantities Palmolive would be a very expensive soap. But enormous production has reduced cost until its moderate price is a striking feature. The Palmolive factories work day and night—ingredients are imported from over-seas in enormous volume. And so Palmolive costs no more than ordinary soaps. You can afford it for every toilet purpose. Remember there is no greater luxury than a bath with Palmolive. Palmolive soap is sold by dealers everywhere. It is made by

Canadian Women's Institutes

Federated Institutes, conveying best wishes to the convention. Resolutions of the 1919 convention were read and reported on. The report of the resolutions committee of the present convention was then called and the following resolutions were adopted:—

That whereas the majority of the Provinces along with the British Isles and Belgium have adopted the name of Women's Institutes, this organization for the future be known as the Women's Institutes of Quebec.

That a Committee of Agriculture be added to our Committees and a Convener be appointed.

That the "Canadian Home Journal" be made the official organ of our organization.

That the details of levying a tax to meet the needs for the Provincial and Federal funds be left to Miss Chute to work out.

That the wording of the Frederica Macfarlane memorial resolution be changed to read: "A girl from a rural district in the Province of Quebec, taking the highest marks in the first year in the School of Household Science."

That the County Executive approach the members of the Provincial Parliament in their counties urging upon them the necessity of so legislating that women may have seats on their school boards, and that efforts be made to secure the bringing of a resolution for this purpose before the House of Parliament.

Reports of the fifty-one branch clubs were then presented.

During the noon hour a school lunch conducted in Cafeteria style was served by the graduating class in the School of Household Science.

The afternoon session which was presided over by Mrs. Smellie of Dundee, comprised reports from Provincial conveners of committees and a demonstration in dyeing by Miss Babb of the Household Science Staff. Methods of using the different commercial dyes were given and illustrated by the dyeing of a white silk blouse navy blue. Hints on blending colors and "topping" were also given.

At the close of the session many of the delegates visited the Military Hospital of Ste. Anne's, others enjoyed visits to the various departments of the College, or walks around the campus.

Shortly after supper the members took advantage of the very kind invitation of the Ste. Anne's Horticultural Society, to join them in a tour of the College grounds under the guidance of Professor Bunting and Mr. Walker of the Horticultural Department of the College. Much information was gained regarding the many shrubs and perennials in bloom and the walk proved most interesting.

At 8.30, the last session of the Convention met in the Assembly Hall with Mrs. Beach of Cowansville in the chair. After several enjoyable selections on the organ by Mr. A. D'Arcy Chapman, Mlle. Leblanc, Demonstrator to the Cercles de Fermieres, spoke on the work of the French speaking clubs. Mlle. Leblanc's outline of the activities and aims of the Cercles and the work carried on by herself and her associates was listened to with great interest. She conveyed to the delegates her great pleasure at having been able to attend their meetings and learn of their doings. Mrs. Milne then very kindly contributed a solo and an encore which were greatly appreciated.

The second speaker of the evening was Miss Kirby, formerly of the Extension Staff, but now Director of the Home Branch of the Soldiers' Settlement Board of Quebec. Miss Kirby explained the scope of her work, and by her vivid pictures of the different phases of it, aroused the keenest interest among her hearers so that when she showed how the Homemakers' Clubs could help in enabling soldiers' wives to become acquainted and find a place in Canadian life it was felt, as the Chairman said, as if a new field of work had been opened up for the Clubs.

A resolution presented by Mrs. McCurdy, seconded by Mrs. Wood, and unanimously adopted, expressed the thanks of the delegates to the college authorities for their hospitality, to the various contributors to the programme for their kindness and to all others who had helped in any way to make the Convention a success.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL POLICY OF FEDERATED WOMEN'S INSTITUTES OF CANADA.

By Elizabeth Bailey Price.

THE Women's Institutes throughout Canada are taking an active part in the promotion of education and better schools, especially in rural communities. Mr. George Putnam, Superintendent of the Women's Institutes of Ontario and convener of the committee on education and better schools of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, has set forth a very aggressive policy, one that every institute member in Canada, whether she be in Peace River, Northern Alberta or in Grande Pre, Nova Scotia, can use her individual effort in helping carry out. Mr. Putnam has gone into the subject very exhaustively and has written each Province trying to locate the weaknesses in its educational system, with a view not to destructive criticism, but to see where the Women's Institutes can lend their energies and co-operation with the various provincial governments to "See that every child in Canada has a fair chance to secure an education under conditions which make for the best physical, mental and moral development."

"First," says Mr. Putnam, "the institutes from one end of the Dominion to the other should see that women get places on the school boards, either as a member or in an advisory capacity."

"Other important phases that tend toward the betterment of our educational system and ones which may be promoted by every institute are:—

1. Well equipped schools kept in faultless sanitary condition.

2. Medical inspection in every school.

3. Hot lunch in every rural school.

4. Supervision of play during the noon and play hours.

5. School sections so organized that the best salaries could be paid to the best teachers in order to retain them.

6. Consolidation of schools where possible.

7. The school house should be a social centre for community activities including games, study and amusement for grown-ups as well as children.

8. The school should be the hub of a circulating library to which every home should have access.

9. The school curriculum should be adapted to the needs of boys and girls who wish to apply their knowledge to the ordinary every-day activities of the home, the farm, the shop and the business world.

10. Provision be made for education along practical lines such as agriculture, domestic science, manual training, etc., and every school board should be induced to take advantage of government aid in this respect.

11. Encouragement of the study of Canadian authors.

12. Promotion of the moving picture as an educational and wholesome entertainment medium and the investigation of the character of many of the pictures to-day which are not only unwholesome but tend to lower the standard of family and social life.

What the Institutes Are Doing Educationally in Each Province.

QUEBEC.—The small, poorly equipped, badly lighted and unsanitary school for which it is difficult to secure competent teachers, is engaging the attention of the few men and women of the Province. Consolidation with good roads upon which millions are being spent will, it is hoped, solve the problem. The Homemakers' Clubs are supporting compulsory education and hope to have the law amended to allow women to sit on School Boards.

The women of Quebec are rejoicing that one of their number has been appointed to act on the Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction. School Fairs under the Department of Agriculture, are being held with very beneficial results, and are assisted by the Homemakers' Clubs. Travelling Libraries are available through McGill and also MacDonald College.

The School Lunch has been the subject of Demonstrations to each of the Clubs. Many Clubs have bought equipment and are serving hot cocoa

Paying the Price

IN the struggle of modern business, he has lacked the stamina to win. His vitality is low, his wits dulled by the slow poisoning of infecting Pyorrhea germs.

Many a man of middle age thus pays the price of dental neglect. Pyorrhea is a disease of the gums, but its germs invade the body and weaken its resistance to physical ills.

Pyorrhea begins with tender and bleeding gums. Then the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the Pyorrhea germs which breed in pockets about the teeth.

If you are nearing forty, watch your gums. Four out of five people over forty have Pyorrhea. Visit your dentist often for tooth and gum inspection—and use Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress, if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy—the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

Editor Concerning Investments:

Kindly inform me as to a good investment for $500.00.

B. A.

A LARGE number of issues might be named, and as I am taking the ground that this is the first investment, which should not be at all speculative, I will confine suggestions to conservative securities. First of all, the investor should not overlook Victory Bonds. I think many people have heard the name so often, that perhaps their attention is apt to be taken by something new. The situation as regards Victory bonds which people should keep in mind, is this: that it was only the extraordinary financial situation induced by war that caused the Dominion Government to offer as high a rate as five and one-half per cent.
per annum for its borrowed money.
Practice in these matters, under usual conditions, becomes fixed. That is to say, normally, the Government could borrow all the millions it needed, at from four to four and one-half per cent. The issue of five and one-half per cent. bonds has of course cheapened the old four per cents. In future, if the time comes when Canada once again is able to borrow money around a four per cent. rate, surrounding conditions will have become such that conservative investors will not be looking for, nor receiving, the lucrative annual return now offered in mortgages, municipal bonds and corporation bonds. The return from issues of that kind will be down one or two points. In that case there will be on the market, new Dominion Government securities selling at par, and paying, say a point less than what the 20-year issue of Victory Loan promised to pay running over a period of twenty years. The investor then will have his choice of buying a Government bond to bring him in $4.50 or $4.75 per year on each hundred he invests, or of buying a Government security that will pay him back $5.50 per annum for each hundred dollars he invests. If the bond paying the smaller rate is to be worth par, or one hundred dollars per hundred dollar bond, on the market, what will the other be worth? Financial experts assume that under the conditions suggested, these 5½% bonds may rise to anywhere between 110 and 125 on the market.

The opportunity offers to acquire bonds issued by the Province of Ontario, carrying interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and running over a period of years ending in 1930, which may be bought at par, that is to say, at one thousand dollars for a $1,000 bond or five hundred dollars for a $500 bond. Here is a straight six per cent. yield, interest payable half-yearly. The bonds may be registered as to principal, which means that the buyer may lodge his name and address with the Treasurer of the Province as the owner of a bond numbered so and so, and of a certain face value. In case then of loss, or theft, a notification to the Treasurer would result in a notification to all the Banks not to base any transaction on such numbered bond.
When a bond is registered also as to interest, this means that the interest is sent to the buyer by cheque; otherwise a bond is a coupon bond, and the holder cuts off his coupon as it becomes due and either cashes it or lodges it in his bank. These Ontario bonds, carrying such a high rate of interest, are very attractive indeed to anyone, and the security behind them is such as need not be called into question at all.

The municipal debenture, that is, a bond issued by a City or Town as an acknowledgment of money borrowed, is one of the sanest and safest forms of investment. I notice a bond firm offering City of St. Catharines 1943 bonds at a price that will yield the investor 6.20% per annum. The denomination or face value of the bond is $1,000. The price is put at 79.52, or $795.20 as the price for one $1,000 bond. The bond pays 4½% per annum, and the yield over the entire term, supposing the buyer holds his bond to maturity and then gets $1,000 back for it, works out at 6.20% per year. This is a long-term bond, and it might have the disadvantage that if the buyer, instead of holding, wished to sell before maturity, he would have to accept the rate offered for a bond carrying a low rate of interest.

This might or might not be compensated for by the price he himself paid for the security when first purchased.
I noticed some "odd lots" of City of Windsor bonds, paying 5½% per annum, offered to yield the investor around 6.30% per year. These bonds have varying maturities, running from 1922 to 1950. There are City of Kitchener bonds, to yield 6.30%, also of varying maturities, also City of St.
Thomas, and many other eastern Canadian municipalities which any good bond firm can supply. There are besides bonds issued by the Provincial Governments, offered running over a fair term of years, and at a very attractive rate. I think the reader may be able to make a selection from the above.

V. S. Montreal.—A proper theory of before he analyzes the competing merits of issues in the one class.

It so happens that both Zenith
Companies and L. R. Steel Co., Inc., issues are, as I would gauge them, decidedly in the class of speculations.
That is to say, neither one is the equal of a Government bond, nor of a municipal debenture, nor of a good corporation bond, nor of a strong stock in a going concern. If both fall outside that range, they must then be catalogued as being of the speculative variety. If we place them in that class, and if we have in advance resolved that our investment funds shall be split up so that only the tail-end of our moneys shall be permitted to go into speculative issues, the first thing the investor must decide is as to whether he is sound in considering these stocks. If he is not, he should not buy them, even though he decide they warrant purchase from an intrinsic point of view. On the other hand, if the funds in this case are so well laid out and so balanced that there are funds available for speculation now, speculation always involving risk both to the capital fund and to the income over future years, then a consideration of the merits of the stocks is in order.

To take up the Zenith Companies first. The Zenith Companies is the name of a holding corporation which is not incorporated in Canada. The Zenith Companies as a corporation has entered into a contract or agreement between the company and several individuals of the United States, under the terms of which Zenith agrees to purchase several insurance concerns, the principal stockholders of which were the few individuals before referred to. The price to be paid runs somewhere around $680,000 in cash for the concerns which form the backbone of the Zenith Companies. I think that in about two years' time the Zenith Companies will have paid off this amount in full; if they do not, in other words, they must fail to own the companies outright. It can be seen, therefore, that one primary purpose of the present campaign to sell stock in Canada must be to provide the funds necessary to pay the vendors for these insurance companies. The par value of the Zenith stock is fifty dollars per share. The stock is being put out, however, at the price of one hundred dollars per share. Applied in actual practice, this means that if the Zenith Companies should make earnings at the rate of ten per cent. per annum on their total outstanding share capital, the purchaser of shares at one hundred dollars would be receiving a return of only five per cent.
on his investment. Zenith Companies, in order to pay shareholders a return of ten per cent., would have to declare dividends at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum. Can Zenith Companies, after selling perhaps two million dollars of stock at par value, earn a dividend each year sufficient to pay ten per cent. on four million dollars? It is questionable that they may be able to do so. Bear in mind also that Zenith Companies is not a Canadian company, although the chief insurance concerns composing it were Canadian companies, doing business principally in the Canadian West. The Zenith Companies is offering for sale common stock. The L. R. Steel Co., Incorporated, is offering for sale preference stock in L. R. Steel Co., Incorporated, which company has a Maryland charter. The total share capital is ten million dollars, of which $900,000 is in preference stock and $100,000 in common stock. The aim and purpose of the company is to create a chain of stores both in Canada and the United States to sell goods ranging in price from 5 cents to one dollar. L. R. Steel, Incorporated, is the American Company. L. R. Steel, Limited, is a $2,000,000 Canadian company, which is owned outright by the company with the Maryland charter. I have spent considerable time investigating the circumstances surrounding the formation of this company and its methods of selling stock. There are two outstanding facts; one is that L. R. Steel, Inc., comes before the public of Canada with only a handful of assets to compare with its share capital of $10,000,000. The other fact is that the company is utilizing the activities of a very large force of salesmen and saleswomen to sell its stock, which agency force are apparently giving out information which is not always accurate. To my mind, the plan of procedure would have been much more orthodox and more convincing if the proprietors of this company had formed a United States corporation, confining their offer of stock in that company to the United States, and had also formed a Canadian company of limited capital. By limited capital I mean that the dimension of the issued shares should bear a reasonable relation to the assets owned by the company when it first appeared before the public, and also should be in keeping with the true value of the assets when the company had become well started in business. If the Steel Company had organized a ten million dollar company in the United States, had sold four million dollars worth of securities, enabling it to create a chain of stores there and perfect its general organization, and had then come into Canada with offer of securities in a two million dollar corporation, or some such figure, the situation would have been much more reassuring than it now is. Under present conditions the Canadian is asked to purchase preference shares in a company incorporated outside Canada, which has a very large share issue. And, in addition, although the head office is in Buffalo, there has to date been more stock sold in Canada than there has in the United States. The reputation of L. R. Steel, head of the business, appears to be that of a successful chain store operator, although he has never before attempted to go into the business on any such scale as is indicated by the capital of the American company. Another circumstance which does not conform with the best financial practice is that, so far as I am aware, there has been no figure set as the exact size of the stock issue in Canada. Unless the Board of Directors allots a certain volume of stock to be sold in Canada, there would appear to be no limit to the selling until all the available stock might be exhausted. The public who are buying are entitled to know beforehand whether they are purchasing into a stock issue of $250,000, or whether they are buying into a stock issue that may possibly run as high as $4,000,000. My present opinion is that the stock is very highly speculative, and should be looked upon in that light by anyone who is asked to purchase.

Select this Rich Finish for your Library, Den or your Billiard Room

NO upholstery is more in keeping with the general tone of the library—in the private home or the public institution—than that which gives the full, warm richness of Fabrikoid. No upholstery for this purpose is more economical. It possesses all the appearance of leather, but is superior in every way. No hard spots that break, no soft, spongy places that rot and tear in Fabrikoid. A surface that will not absorb water or grease, that is uniform throughout, and will wear years longer than many leathers.

Make this the upholstery for your library furniture—for your den or smoking room. Try the oak panelled-wall finish, with Moorish or Machine Spanish Fabrikoid—those rich, two-toned effects—in the panel centres. It will give a finish that is almost indestructible under ordinary wear, that is rich and handsome and easily kept clean and sanitary.

When you buy new furniture insist that it is upholstered with Fabrikoid and you will insure yourself of longer wear.

Ask your dealer about it today. Write for our free booklet, "Fabrikoid in the Home."
